A Night With the Census: Catch as Catch Can

by Bill Kisliuk and Tom McCarthy

At 1:30 a.m. on S-Night, March 21—the night the U.S. Census Bureau attempted to count the nation's homeless in shelters and on the streets—Civic Center Plaza was a quiet scene. At least 100 people slept in or around the park that fronts City Hall, while others talked quietly or shuffled to and from the portable toilets in the plaza.

A small fire burned on the lawn behind the Mayor's Office of Housing at 100 Larkin St., while two men pushed a shopping cart full of donuts through the park and along the surrounding streets, offering them to anyone who was awake.

A half an hour later, a crew of census enumerators carrying clipboards and wearing white vests walked through the plaza, counting the sleepers and talking with those who were awake. Peeking around every corner, shining flashlights down staircases and into remote areas, the census workers sought out everyone in the plaza.

Census workers did not limit themselves to the more well-known areas where homeless people congregate. "We will be counting the homeless in the parks and the streets, under the freeway ramps, and exiting abandoned buildings," said Census District Manager Norman Ishimoto, who was re-

Business Exodus Changes The Face of Jones Street

by Hugo Martinez

From the corner of Market Street, lower Jones Street in the evening is a horizon flattened by stretches of empty parking lots, broken only by the darkened silhouettes of vacant businesses. Several groups of young men congregate at the corners of the street, while an elderly woman draws on a cigar in her wheelchair in front of the abandoned Hibernia Bank building.

Just a year and a half ago, the first two blocks of Jones Street, starting at Market Street, was a relatively stable neighborhood. Four businesses bordering the area were still open, including a beauty supply shop, a flower stand that had been on the corner of Market and Jones streets for 26 years, and Herrington's Bar, a popular neighborhood hangout for more than half a century.

Now these businesses are closed, and some neighborhood residents, including homeless people, think life here has become increasingly desperate and violent.

To many residents, this area of Jones Street is on the edge, fighting to keep its few remaining businesses from moving off the street and to find merchants willing to risk investing in what rapidly is turning into a no man's land for business.

According to Randy Shaw of the Tenderloin Housing Clinic, when Herrington's Bar went out of business

Advocates Blast New Welfare Investigations As Attack on S.F.'s Poor

by R.V. Scheide

While Mayor Art Agnos has vowed to house the city's homeless by the end of the year, advocates of the poor say a new Department of Social Services (DSS) program may wind up keeping people on the streets.

Billed as potentially saving the county up to $3 million annually by exposing fraudulent claims, the Fraud Early Detection and Prevention Unit (FRED) scrutinizes applicants to Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) and General Assistance (G.A.). The program began investigating AFDC applicants on Feb. 20 and expanded March 1 to include General Assistance applicants.

"The underlying assumption of FRED is that poor people are somehow out to beat the system," said Sandy Weiner, co-director of the Income Rights Project, who has opposed FRED since the program was proposed for San Francisco last year.

An Income Rights Project study of the 23 California counties that have implemented the program, and one conducted by the Auditor General of California in 1989, revealed that estimates of how much counties can save with the FRED program were inflated. The estimated savings are based on the assumption

Boxing in the Shadow of History at Newman's Gym on Leavenworth

by Bill Kisliuk

For three minutes at a time, Tom Maguire dances alone, jabbing and poking at an imaginary opponent.

A loud bell rings, indicating a one minute break, then rings again, signaling three more furious minutes of shadowboxing, sparring, punching the bags, or jumping rope.

Maguire, like his brother before him, is learning to box in Newman's Gym on Leavenworth Street, the oldest boxing gymnasium in the country. A Tenderloin institution since 1924, Newman's is the only remaining gym in a city once renowned as a boxing town.

Newman's has played host to many of boxing's major and minor legends: Cassius Clay, Rocky Marciano, Bobo Olson, and San Francisco's own Pride-of-the-Sunset, 'Irish' Pat Lawlor, have put in time and sweat under the lights. Newman's has also been a training ground for successes in other fields, like San Francisco Supervisor Terence 'KO' Hallinan, State Assemblyman Willie Brown, former mayor George Moscone, and numerous San Francisco police officers and firefighters.

Supervisor Hallinan, who first learned to pull the punches he needs as a politician in the sweaty confines of Newman's Gym, says, "Newman's was a one-time colossus of the West. I have memories from the gym literally emblazoned into my brain."

The gym opened in 1924 in the grand ballroom of the Cadillac Hotel at Eddy and Leavenworth streets, and was run by partners Moose Taussig and Paddy Ryan until Billy Newman took over in 1941. The old gym had two rings, punching bags, locker rooms, and bleachers along the wall for neighborhood kids and fighters to watch the action in the rings. Just outside the gym, near the Ringside Restaurant (now the Sizzler), a boxer turned preacher had a shoe-shine stand, where he would occasionally preach religion or boxing to his patrons.

Gym proprietor Billy Newman, a slightly-built man, is fondly remembered by those who frequented the gym before his death in 1983.

"Mr. Newman was the first and last of the gentlemen," said Leroy Loooper, executive director of Reality House West, which owns the Cadillac Hotel where the gym was housed for nearly 60 years. "If you wrote a book on etiquette, he would personify that."

Manny Romero, 76, who grew up fighting in the streets of San Francisco's Excelsior District, remembers, "I used to go to Newman's when I was a kid, and Newman was a real nice guy. If a kid had no money, Newman let him train for free."

Soon after Newman's death, the gym moved from the Cadillac Hotel, and set up at 142 Leavenworth St., a couple

Another Word on TNDC

Editors:
What gives? Is Keith Grier's Tenderside column now a monthly critique of TNDC? In January, Grier slammed TNDC for raising the 509 Cultural Center's rent when, in fact, we had just reduced it. Last month, Grier admitted he had given us a lashing but offered neither an apology nor words which truly portrayed TNDC's support of the 509 Cultural Center. Instead, he still made it seem as if we were increasing their rent and "effectively closing that fine place." So, don't the facts matter to The Tenderloin Times?!
As if that were not enough, Grier added that we are not part of the community and just out for profits. Well, thanks, Keith! Your well-read (inaccurate) columns are guaranteed to sow discord and disharmony.
It may not be deemed pressworthy but TNDC is working hard, as part of the neighborhood, to provide housing to the neighborhood at a very low cost. We would ask you to please look elsewhere if you wish to expose groups who are not a part of the community or who wish to exploit it.

Agnos is Declaring War on the Homeless

Editors:
We, as members of the Homeless Task Force of the North of Market Planning Coalition, unequivocally denounce Mayor Art Agnos' plan to end sleeping on the streets by the end of the year, as it was revealed to the Union Square Association. While the city has taken many positive steps to ease the crisis of homelessness, we must fully express our outrage at the Mayor's statements of March 7. Not only were they made unilaterally, without input from the homeless community, but these comments open the door for an extremely dangerous scenario in the future.
We know that even after the proposed multi-service centers open up, there will still be thousands of people in the street. The two new emergency shelters are only going to serve 200 people each, and one is already open. It doesn't take a genius to conclude that 200 additional temporary, short term spaces will not provide a "decent, humane alternative" for the city's 6,000-10,000 homeless people. There simply will not be permanent, low-cost housing for most homeless people by 1991.

Because the homeless community knows that there are no proposals to house these large numbers of people, we immediately saw the Mayor's statements as a justification for massive police repression of homeless people. He swept the Civic Center last summer, cleaned out Golden Gate Park in December (in the aftermath of a major natural disaster), and, for the last two months, has been engaging in the illegal confiscation and destruction of homeless people's personal belongings. Due to these very real incidents, a city-wide police crackdown of unprecedented proportions is not beyond the imagination of the person in the street.

We deplore any attempts to further escalate police action against homeless people and reiterate our call for permanent, low-cost housing and decent paying jobs. As for the recent controversy, it is obvious that the Mayor's plan to eradicate homelessness amounts to nothing short of a declaration of war on homeless people.

Mr. Agnos has cleverly framed the debate in terms of choice and civil rights. He has created the perception that, by 1991, all of San Francisco's homeless people will have the choice between a shelter bed or a jail cell. Thus, he has left many homeless people and civil rights advocates to the task of defending a person's right to sleep on the street. We dream of the day when there will be nothing else to do but argue about whether someone can choose to freeze to death or not. Yet, in 1990, there is no plan to add 6,000-10,000 low-cost units to the city's housing stock, and there will be no alternative when the SFPD is sent to run rampant upon the city's homeless people. That's reality.

U.S. Must Take a Stand Against the Khmer Rouge

Editors:
I am concerned about the role of the United States in the continuing war in Cambodia.

The Khmer Rouge, led by Pol Pot, was responsible for the deaths of over one million people and the destruction of the physical, social, and political structure of this country of eight million people. The killing was only stopped by the invasion of Cambodia by the Vietnamese, an act which is looked upon as "liberation" by many Cambodians.

The Khmer Rouge retreated to the Thai border, where they formed a resistance coalition that includes forces loyal to former Prince Sihanouk and former Prime Minister Son Sann. That coalition is recognized and supported by both the United States and the United Nations.

It is as unconscionable that the U.S. continues to support a Cambodian coalition including the Khmer Rouge as it would have been to sponsor a military or political settlement in Germany that included Hitler and his staff.

Our support of the resistance coalition is de facto support for the Khmer Rouge. Recent film footage shown on British television showed U.S.-made weapons being used by Khmer Rouge troops attacking a village in north west Cambodia.

I agree with the necessity for an enhanced United Nations role in settling the Cambodian conflict. But I am fearful that the U.N. Security Council's proposal does not take into account the strength of the Khmer Rouge and its hold on villages in the rural areas of Cambodia, nor does it consider the contradiction of attempting to hold a free and fair election when Cambodia's U.N. seat is held by representatives of the Khmer Rouge. Therefore, I believe the United States government must:

1. Recommend that the U.N. seat held by the resistance coalition be vacated pending elections in Cambodia.
2. Insist that the Khmer Rouge be excluded from any transitional government and that its organization and leaders be excluded from participation in the future government of Cambodia.
3. Suspend the sending of any United States aid to the Cambodian resistance coalition.

Mayor's 'Beyond Shelter' Plan Continues to Draw Fire

by Sara Colm

"The homeless, city officials, and the press have known all along that the final step in the process would be to cite those who refuse to comply [with the request to limit their belongings to what they could carry], and confiscate any material that is impeding access to [Civic Center] park. The homeless themselves will be asked to move when we can offer them housing."

—Art Agnos, July 1989

When Mayor Art Agnos proposed extending a business tax last month before the Union Square Association to bolster his homeless program, advocates began to fear that Agnos' bargaining chip would be the civil rights of homeless people, while glossing over real remedies to the problem, such as permanent housing and jobs.

"Letting people live on the streets is not a choice we as a city are going to accept, and once this system is up and running, it won't be a choice we permit anymore," said Agnos at the March 7 meeting of Union Square merchants. "They may prefer to sleep on the streets, but they will lose that right if they have a decent, humane alternative."

Agnos is to be commended for successfully pressuring the Red Cross to contribute $6 million to San Francisco's homeless program, and asking the business community to chip in as well. But the mayor's comments before the merchants, and his statements made last summer in regard to the controversial Civic Center homeless encampment, suggest the city is prepared to use force to take homeless people to shelters.

Without grounds for arrest, this policy would expose the city to costly lawsuits on false arrest or even kidnapping charges, according to the ACLU. As Police Chief Frank Jordan and the Police Commission have firmly stated, being homeless in itself is not criminal, unless the person is committing a crime or is a danger to themselves or others.

"Agnos needs to stop using the word 'alternative' or 'option' if he's going to use the police to take people to the shelters," said Paul Boden of the San Francisco Coalition on Homelessness. "He should use the word 'mandatory.' For police to sweep homeless people up off the streets is disenfranchisement based solely on economic factors. Why take away people's choice only because they're poor?"

The mayor's statements about the homeless "losing their right" to sleep on the streets is based on shaky legal ground. City law only prohibits sleeping in city parks at night, and regulations prohibiting obstruction of the sidewalk are vague. The courts have upheld panhandling as a constitutional right to free speech and have thrown out state vagrancy laws. And there's nothing on the books that prohibits sleeping in parks, or up against the side of a building, or during the day—the hours when merchants are most concerned about homeless people and panhandlers.

"There's no problem if the city uses [social] workers to do outreach for its programs," said John Crew, an attorney with the ACLU. "But if people say 'No,' they've got to respect that. The bottom line is that Agnos' homeless programs have to be attractive enough that people will voluntarily participate."

Following the furor that erupted after his speech before the merchants' association, Agnos amended his statements, saying that he never intended to use force to get people to go to shelters.

"If I was going to start rusting people or start some sort of sinister sweeps, I could have done that for the last two years and saved myself a lot of political headaches and heartaches," Agnos told The Times on March 15. "I haven't done that and I'm not about to start. What we can do is start to give people the kind of options they need. I maintain that if there is a decent, humane alternative, people will want to come inside."

But Boden and other advocates contend that until the city provides low-income housing, Agnos is not solving the problem, nor providing real choices, but adopting an "out of sight, out of mind" attitude. The two multi-service centers Agnos has proposed are a great concept, advocates say, provided there are exits from the centers into permanent or transitional housing. Otherwise, advocates say, the concept doesn't work.

"We see the multi-service centers as a decent option for people to have—if they choose it," said Boden. "But basically it's a band-aid. Shelter will never be housing. To expect people to transition out with no permanent housing to transition into is unrealistic."

The mayor has pledged to end sleeping on the street as a commonplace occurrence by 1991, yet advocates say his envisioned safety net program is riddled with holes that would leave hundreds out in the cold. The city estimates that each night it shelters approximately 3,000 of San Francisco's estimated 6,000 homeless people, including beds at the Pierce Arrow multi-service center and hotline hotels.

Even with an infusion of funds from the Red Cross, FEMA, business levies, and Hetch Hetchy reservoir water sales, the mayor's new programs will create only an additional 500 shelter and transitional housing spaces this year: 200 new multi-service center beds and 300 transitional housing units, leaving 2,500 still out on the streets.

A closer look at the city's numbers shows further holes in the safety net. How to get people—particularly single men—out of the shelters and into homes is one glaring trouble spot in Agnos' plan. Five of the pending transitional housing projects—some 168 units of temporary housing—are restricted to specific groups: families, battered women, mentally ill, and youth. The hotline program, down to 400 spaces after the Oct. 17 earthquake, only accepts homeless people who meet certain criteria: hospital referrals, women, undocumented immigrants, or the elderly.

Unemployed males between the ages of 20 and 55—which were 89 percent of the 1,100 people formerly using the hotline—still have few places to go.

The prospect for permanent housing options for the homeless also looks dismal. While the modified payments program now houses some 700 people, many of the 2,800 permanent housing units projected by the city to be initiated or go on line this year still sit vacant or await final funding approval, such as the Hamlin Hotel on Eddy Street or proposed Redevelopment Agency-financed hotels South of Market.

For the majority of those who would remain unsheltered under the mayor's plans, the city has coined the convenient term, "irregularly housed." These are some 1,500 people who are homeless only a portion of every month. If you add the "irregularly housed" to the number the city is currently sheltering or hopes to have indoors by December 1990, it just so happens to add up to a little over 6,000. By sleight of hand, the numbers show that the city can solve the problem and get everyone off the street—at least most of the time—by December 1990.

"The city arbitrarily extrapolated the numbers of 'irregularly housed,'" said Josh Brandon of the Homeless Coalition. "Besides, where are they to sleep during the period of being homeless?"

The Mayor's Homeless Coordinator Bob Prentice said, "While we certainly want to create places where [the irregularly housed] can live, that wasn't really the primary focus of the multi-service centers. We don't expect the multi-service centers will draw people in who are paying out of their pockets for Tenderloin hotels part of the month. They're intended for the most vulnerable people, those living on the streets."

There are ominous signs that Agnos, like his predecessor Dianne Feinstein, is intent on freezing San Francisco's homeless programs as soon as the numbers add up properly and he can say he's sheltered all of the city's homeless. At a January meeting with homeless representatives of the Mayor's Homeless Coordinating Council, Agnos referred to an ordinance in Washington, D.C., that prohibited people from coming to that city specifically to receive shelter, and he urged that San Francisco adopt a similar policy.

"When are we going to draw the line?" Agnos asked the Council, according to members who were present. "When can I say I've done enough?"

Homeless advocates charge that Agnos' penchant for political expediency is interfering with his sense of common decency and the law. California statutory law requires the county to support anyone who is not otherwise supported, prohibiting it from artificially capping its homeless program. Agnos' statements conjure up images of the city setting up border guards at the city's bridges or instituting I.D. checks in shelter lines in order for people to receive shelter and services.

When Agnos gets into the numbers game with the homeless, he begins to emphasize quantity over quality, shelter over housing, getting people out of sight rather than into jobs and homes.

As one homeless advocate said, "There is a war going on here. Some wars have a body count; others have a bed count." By focusing on numbers—getting people off the streets and into shelter beds—Agnos is ignoring the root of the problem: shelters are not the answer and never will be. Housing—permanent, decent, low-cost housing—is the humane alternative for homeless people. And until that's provided, the critics say, Agnos is missing the point.

"Instead of hanging out in the parks, they'll hang out in the multi-service centers—maybe," said Randy Shaw of the Tenderloin Housing Clinic. "Agnos' plan removes them from sight but doesn't necessarily solve their homelessness."

AIDS Fair Pushes Prevention

Glide Memorial Church inaugurated its first AIDS Fair at Boeddeker Park on March 16, distributing condoms, bleach and information on how to prevent the spread of AIDS.

"We must educate ourselves and others," said Joyce Soules, Glide outreach coordinator. "AIDS is wiping out an entire generation."

Glide is advocating that an AIDS hospice be built in the city and the church plans to establish a support group for the children of people with AIDS and to start a monthly newsletter to get the public involved in its AIDS outreach.

Glide was joined by the San Francisco AIDS Foundation, ACTION, Westside Tenderloin Detox, YES, PHREDA, and Planned Parenthood.

Parc 55 Charged with Spying On and Intimidating Workers

by Lisa Mountz

In symbolic protest, striking Parc 55 employees and union supporters donned paper cut out masks and marched outside the Parc 55 Hotel, 55 Cyril Magnin St. on March 19.

The nearly 200 demonstrators gathered to mark the first day of the National Labor Relations Board's hearings on charges that Parc 55 owner Lawrence Chan and his management team have committed over 70 violations of federal labor law.

"Parc 55 has conducted the most systematic and vicious campaign against our union that we have ever seen," said Sherri Chiesa, president of Local 2, the Hotel and Restaurant Workers Union.

The NLRB has cited the hotel for dozens of charges, including retaliation and threats against workers who supported the unionization of Parc 55 and interrogation of employees about their union activities. Recently Parc 55 security staff has taken pictures of demonstrators and, according to union spokespersons, fired a hotel employee identified in those pictures. The union charges that management has also interfered with the distribution of union literature and bribed and spied on employees.

Strikers wore masks to hide their identity from management to dramatize what they say is harassment of Parc 55 workers. Union representatives said that a room cleaner at the Parc 55 was fired after being shown a picture of herself and her children at a Parc 55 union demonstration.

Dan King, general manager of Parc 55, called the charges "unadulterated nonsense. The reason we are taking pictures is because they're breaking the law," said King. "We have a restraining order against many of the demonstrators who have marched inside the lounge, carport and lobby and blocked our customers' entrance and egress. They are violating the restraining order each week. We've had them arrested repeatedly."

The workers are fighting for medical benefits and regular wage increases, but their main focus, they said, is gaining respect from management and a voice on the job.

"We have a very large majority of hotel workers in the Parc 55 who are signing the cards indicating they want to be union," said Kevin O'Connor, staff director of Local 2. Many of the workers, however, are afraid to come forward because of the hotel's anti-union practices, O'Connor said.

Greyhound Drivers Strike For Pensions, Better Pay

by Ron Holladay

Hamp Brown, a Greyhound bus driver for 23 years, and about 25 fellow strikers gathered around a barbecue grill at the Seventh Street Greyhound Station where they've been picketing around the clock since the Greyhound strike began March 2.

"As long as we stay strong, they can't run these buses with unqualified drivers," said Brown, one of the 300 local striking drivers. "Either we are going to have to stand in unity or we're going to be defeated."

Janis Borchardt, vice president of Amalgamated Transit Union Local 1225, said the drivers decided to strike because they haven't had a pay increase since 1983. According to Borchardt, drivers were forced to accept several pay cuts including a 25 percent cut in 1983 when the present owner Fred Currey took over the bus company.

"Drivers are making the same as they were in 1980. What a joke," said Borchardt, adding that each year inflation has run at 5 percent.

Greyhound spokesperson Steve Scarpino countered, "We are one of the highest paid interstate bus carriers in the U.S.," noting that drivers average a salary of $24,743 per year.

The union wants Greyhound to raise drivers' wages by 5 percent each year for the next three years, and to furnish drivers hired after 1983 with a pension plan that previously-hired drivers received.

Despite the strike, Greyhound is striving to continue its services. The bus line provides transportation to more than 9,000 communities and is the only service available to many low-income people and small communities. On March 2, Scarpino said, Greyhound service was operating at 35 percent of what it had been running at a year ago.

"That was the Easter holiday season last year and travel was at a holiday high," he said. "This year the holiday is later, so travel is at a low." The company expects service to increase daily, Scarpino said, "as more drivers cross over [the picket line] and new drivers are hired."

As of Monday, March 26, Greyhound said 459 drivers had crossed over the picket line and they had hired 1,464 "permanent replacement drivers," according to Scarpino.

However, Jeffrey Nelson, spokesperson for the union said, "The company is stewing up numbers that have no basis in reality." He said that as of Friday, March 23 only 106 union drivers of 6,300 drivers nationwide had abandoned the strike.

To keep the buses running, the company has hired drivers with a minimum of one year experience and is now advertising for "inexperienced drivers" who will be given a five to seven week bus driving course, and a two-week course for drivers with one year's experience.

Meanwhile, talks between Greyhound and the union are at a deadlock after negotiations broke off the week-end of March 18. "The union brought back a proposal that asks for three times more than Greyhound could afford," said Scarpino. "This company has lost $20 million in the last three years."

Union leader Borchardt said the strike is going strong. "There are lots of other labor unions and community groups that have rallied behind us, including Mayor Art Agnos, who came to our picket line and held a press conference saying that he's supporting the strikers," Borchardt said.

Emotions during the strike have run high on both sides. A month ago, a striker was run over and killed by a Greyhound bus driver, and at bus terminals across the country, there continue to be reports of violence that the Greyhound bus company attributes to unionists.

On March 27, Greyhound officials offered a $100,000 reward for anyone who has information that leads to the arrest and conviction of people shooting at Greyhound buses or terminals.

"There have been 21 shootings nationwide on buses and two shootings on terminals," said Scarpino. The latest shooting occurred in Amarillo, Tex., on March 26, when a bus was fired on.

Homeless Census

sponsible for the count of the homeless in the northern half of the city.

The Census Bureau hired and trained about 250 people—30 who were homeless themselves—to count the homeless in the northern part of the city on S-Night—but only 201 people actually appeared for the job.

In Phase One of S-Night, during the early evening hours of March 20, the census workers counted those living in shelters and hotline hotels as identified by a Planning Department map and canvassing by the Census Bureau. Then, in Phase Two—from midnight until 4 a.m. on March 21—census workers roamed the streets and parks looking for homeless sleeping under the stars at 56 sites identified by the Planning Department and local advocates who know where the homeless congregate out of doors. Finally, in Phase Three, at dawn on March 21, census workers observed and counted people exiting six abandoned buildings.

"If Phase One of S-Night is any indication," Ishimoto said at midnight on March 20, "then the count will be a success in terms of reaching the people we want to reach."

Despite Ishimoto's optimism, the bureau's homeless count ran into snags. Six Tenderloin residential hotels refused to allow census workers to enter on S-Night. A shelter set up at Canon Kip Community center since the Oct. 17 earthquake was left off the census workers' roster until late in the day on March 20. At the Episcopal Sanctuary shelter on 8th Street, census workers were unable to interview many of the shelter's Spanish-speaking residents.

Ishimoto said census workers were able to enlist staff from the Episcopal Sanctuary to act as interpreters. Even without interpreters, the count could have gone on, he said. "A worker doesn't have to interview them to count them."

Evidently, the night shift staff at the six uncounted Tenderloin hotels was never informed that the census workers would be paying a visit on the evening of March 20, said Ishimoto, adding that census workers visited the hotels two days later and counted the people then.

The Census Bureau admits it never intended to count all of the homeless people on the nation's streets, but to merely count those that are visible and approachable. The bureau instructed enumerators not to enter abandoned buildings or approach darkened wooded areas in parks.

"We weren't going to do anything impractical, illegal, or dangerous," said Ishimoto, adding that those who wished to "hide" from census workers for whatever reason would not be sought out.

"We use the bedroom analogy," said

Ishimoto. "We wouldn't send a census worker into your bedroom at 3:30 a.m. to count the people there, and we will not violate the privacy of the homeless."

When the census enumerators arrived in Civic Center Plaza, they were accompanied by a press entourage complete with T.V. glare lights and photo flash units.

Many of those who were awake cooperated with the census, answering the workers' questions and even joking with them. Others were not as happy about the visitors to the plaza. Sleepers became restless as the census takers came near, pursued closely by T.V. cameras, photographers, and reporters.

"They degrade us," said Joseph, a longtime resident of Civic Center Plaza. "All they need to do is count us. But instead they shine a light or stick a paper in your face."

A half-dozen people sleeping on the concrete stoop of the Mayor's Office of Housing at 100 Larkin St. yelled at a T.V. cameraman who had come too close. "Hey! No cameras here!" they shouted.

The intrusion of the press was something Ishimoto feared. "The flashes and the lights are disturbing the people, and making the count more difficult," said Ishimoto, who accompanied the census workers in Civic Center Plaza, and at one point asked the photographers and cameramen to back off.

"There was a problem at the Pierce Arrow shelter," he said. "There were so many reporters and cameramen at the shelter entrance, our workers had to force their way inside."

But away from the more well-known encampments, the count was quiet, cordial even.

"So far the people have been real cooperative," said Chris, a census enumerator walking the Tenderloin with her partner Bob. "It's all in how you talk to them, how you approach them," she said. Chris and Bob spoke with the press on the condition their last names not be used. "I feel more comfortable that way," said Chris.

Chris and Bob approached an older man standing on the corner of McAllister and Hyde streets. "Has anyone from the census talked to you this evening?" Chris asked. The man hadn't been counted yet, so Chris and Bob asked him a few questions about his race, age, and ethnicity.

Later, at about 3 a.m., Chris and Bob "set up shop" on the corner of McAllister and Market streets under the yellow street lamps, using a trash can as a desk, and asking passersby to answer their questions and be counted.

"No, I don't want any of what you are selling," said a man walking briskly by, a bedroll over his shoulder.

"Male, mid-thirties, white," said Chris and Bob wrote this down.

peered into dark alleyways, checked down stairwells, and counted sleeping forms huddled behind planters and shrubs.

Later, Chris and Bob walked through the darkened streets of the Tenderloin, pausing to count the people sleeping in doorways and estimating their ages, races, and sex.

"We're not supposed to wake up anybody," Chris whispered as she and Bob counted a man asleep in front of the YMCA on Golden Gate Avenue.

"They told us not to ask questions of people engaged in money making activities," said Chris, as they spotted a prostitute working the shadow-slashed corner of Hyde and Turk streets.

Chris and Bob completed their shift just as the night sky was turning light blue in the east.

Down Market Street, near Hallidie Plaza, a man named Jones—"Just Jones, is all"—sat on a bench and turned up the collar of his army surplus parka toward the cold wind coming down the street.

"No, I didn't do the census," he said. "I just don't trust them. They might give that stuff to the cops. I got enough trouble."

Trouble is what another homeless man named Dan Carroll has had all his life, he said, but he answered the census takers' questions when they approached him on Powell Street where he was walking just to keep warm.

"I don't care, they're just doing some work," he said. "They say it's important." Carroll, who sleeps in parks during the day, drank from a bottle to ward off the morning chill. "They don't want to know anything. They just want to count you."

At 8:30 a.m., the day after S-Night, a tired and red-eyed Norman Ishimoto met with the press. "In my district, the count went very smoothly, without incident, and was a success," he said. "We covered our area very thoroughly."

Ishimoto said that by the end of the year, the bureau will have preliminary figures compiled on the nation's homeless population, which the bureau will add to the overall national count.

To check on the accuracy of the government count, the Coalition on Homelessness and the Homeless Task Force conducted a "homeless census" themselves on March 22 and 23.

"It is very possible that the San Francisco count will be short," said homeless advocate Josh Brandon, who is a member the Mayor's Complete Count Committee. "That will affect the federal and state money the city receives for homeless shelters and programs."

At 6 p.m. on March 22, 15 people conducted a survey in six open air sites where census workers had counted. Task force surveyors went out to food lines on the morning of March 23 to search for more homeless who may have been missed by the Census Bureau. In all, the homeless groups talked to 1,008 people in a 20-hour period.

"Of the 1,008 people, 353 know they were included in the census and 122 spoke no English or were uncooperative," said Brandon. "The remaining 533 do not know if they were counted, although many of them could have been asleep."

"We went out and asked people if they cooperated with the census, and asked where they slept that night," said Sherry Williams of the Homeless Task Force. "Our count was a sample of [the Census Bureau's count], to monitor the census, not duplicate it, but to look at their process and evaluate it."

Ishimoto was unimpressed by the statistics gathered by the homeless groups. The majority of people were fast asleep when they were counted, he said. "They wouldn't know if they were counted because census workers were instructed not to wake them," he said.

Ishimoto also sees room for improvement for the next census, in the year 2010. "We need better maps, with all the alleys and side streets, and more attention to the languages spoken in an area," he said.

The Homeless Task Force says it will call for the Census Bureau to adjust its figures on the homeless. "It is not our responsibility to tell them how much to adjust their figures by," said Brandon, "but we want to remind them constantly that their figures are inaccurate."

Based on the task force's data, Brandon said, the Mayor's Complete Count Committee could sue the federal government to get them to adjust the census figures.

The King is Alive!

Elvis Appears in the Tenderloin; Exits in Flying Cadillac

by Sasha Ruda

As witnesses stood back in awe, Elvis Presley made a rare appearance in the Tenderloin on March 13, entering Daldas Market at the corner of Taylor and Eddy streets and saying to the clerk, "Son, I want a hunka, hunka, hunka burnin' Milk Duds."

The famous dead singer has made surprise appearances off and on over the years since expiring in 1977, but mostly at 7-11s in the Midwest. This was Elvis' first Bay Area appearance that anyone could remember.

"The King stopped by the park," said a dazzled Keith Grier, "and belted out a few of his many great hits. My favorite was always 'Heartbreak Hotel.' And man, what cool threads!"

The King, dressed in a white sequined leather jumpsuit, flowing white cape, and blue suede shoes, stopped traffic as he walked up Eddy Street to the Sizzler, where he lunched on shrimp cocktails and ice cream.

"It was really him," said a breathless Richard Livingston. "Elvis was always my idol."

"I'll listen to James Brown anytime," countered an unimpressed Leroy Looper. "Elvis was a pencil-neck geek."

Tenderloin Times office manager Greer Lluad encountered Elvis on the corner of Turk and Taylor streets as she exited a local grocery after buying some Skittles.

"Whenever I hear him sing 'Teddy Bear,' my teeth break into a cold sweat," said Lluad, usually known as being cool as a secretary of state, collected as a Venetian blind. "Elvis ate my brain," she gushed.

Elvis then made his way over to Glide, where he and Rev. Cecil Williams led the church choir in some righteous gospel tunes and a couple of rockabilly numbers.

"I told him he was welcome anytime to sing with the choir," said Williams, "and he promised to come again and spend a celebration with the congregation."

This reporter finally caught up to the King as he walked past St. Anthony Dining Room.

"I just wanna be thought of as one of the people, one of God's little children," Elvis said, munching an Eskimo Pie. Asked why he disappeared for so long, Elvis said, "I was getting too big, too phenomenal, too huge... man, I was up to 400 pounds, at least."

Elvis confirmed reports in the tabloids that he has achieved immortality through living on Mars and breeding a whole race of Elvis clones with Martian women. Soon, he hopes, Elvis will be everywhere.

"Occasionally, though, I just get a hankering for fried chicken or a cheeseburger," he said, explaining his periodic appearances back here on Planet Earth. Sleeping with aliens and living forever arc, apparently, no substitute for home cooking.

"I thought being a star all over the world was a big responsibility," sighed Elvis. "Well, being an intergalactic superstar—playing shows all over the universe—man, that's pressure."

Elvis bid the Tenderloin a fond adieu as he climbed aboard his flying saucer/Cadillac. He ripped up the SFPD parking ticket that was tucked under his windshield and roared off to the heavens, leaving the multitudes standing agape and awestruck.

$105 Million 'Library of the Future' Slated to Open in 1995

by Jennifer Wright

Library commissioners opened a new chapter in the history of the Main Branch of San Francisco Public Library last month when they unveiled plans for building a $105 million new library in Marshall Square, across Fulton Street from the library's current location.

As presently envisioned, the new library building will be seven stories, two of which will be underground, according to Kathy Page, the library's chief of facilities development. The new site will take up the entire block bordered by Hyde, Grove, Larkin, and Fulton streets except for a corner left for the Pioneer Monument statue. The building will be about twice the size of the existing building, totaling 330,000 square feet of usable space, as opposed to the current library's 175,000 square feet.

Construction is expected to be completed in 1995, when books and other materials will be moved into the new building. The Asian Art Museum will then take over the current library building.

The New York architectural firm of Pei, Cobb, Freed and the local firm of Simon, Martin-Vegue, Winkelstein, Morris will be working together on the design of the new building and are expected to submit their preliminary plans this fall, Page said.

At a March 13 library commission meeting, several of the 40 people present expressed fears that books were to be discarded in favor of computers, an idea formulated in City Librarian Ken Dowlin's 1984 book called "The Library of the Future."

However, Page assured the group that obscure books will not be thrown out. "We're not going to use computers to replace books," Page said. The library's computer terminals will only be used for cataloguing purposes, checking out books, and other administrative tasks, she said.

The ambitious plans for the new library include: a gift/book shop; a larger children's area, including an "electronic discovery center;" a Browsing Collection housing mainly newer books; service areas for the deaf and blind; a Newcomers' Help Center to include books in non-English languages and ESL learning materials; and a San Francisco History Room.

Many at the March 13 meeting also expressed concern that the library's plans extend only to the year 2010, at which point the library will be again filled to capacity, according to estimates. "We should plan for a library to last at least 50 years," one woman said. She also noted that more space could be freed for books if not so much space were allocated to staff facilities, including meeting rooms, a kitchen, and a bathroom with showers.

A city bond program will pay for construction of the building, at a cost estimated at $105 million. The interior furnishings will be financed separately through a newly-formed library foundation, said Marcia Schneider, the library's community relations director.

Twice the size of the old library, the new library's construction is expected to be completed in 1995.

Currently, many books are housed in the Presidio Branch Library because of earthquake damage at the main library. Within the next two months or so, Schneider estimated, a retrieval system will be set up so library patrons can request those books in storage upon 48-hour request. According to Schneider, the books will all be back in the main library and available to patrons just as they were before the earthquake "many years before the construction of the new library."

But these arrangements do not please everyone, including library staffers. The case of librarian Annette McNair is one that other staffers point to as an example of what happens when a staffer speaks her mind.

McNair was a staffer at the main library, but after she publicly criticized the Main's reorganization, she was reassigned as a "floater," a supplemental staffer who travels from branch to branch where extra staff is needed.

McNair is appealing her reassignment through her union, and said her new job appeared to be a punishment. "There was a feeling among the staff that that was the case," she said, declining to comment further until her appeal has been heard.

John Maguire, the library's personnel director, said: "In any organization, there are lots of reasons for placement decisions, and everyone can't be where they want to be. We never use reassignment as a means of punishment."

Neighbors Seek Solutions for Troubled Jones Street

In December 1988, the street took a nose dive. "When you have a series of vacant store fronts and on the other side of the street there are parking lots, that's where people are going to hang out," said Shaw.

Daniel Piccinini, an attorney who opened his law office at 124 Jones Street 10 years ago, said he is moving out of the neighborhood because it is no longer safe. According to Piccinini and other business people in the area, their clients are harassed, mainly by marijuana dealers who have concentrated in the first two blocks of Jones Street during the last year.

Piccinini's family first opened a business in this area in 1966. Before deciding to move out of the family-owned building, Piccinini sought help from the mayor's office, but "they were uncooperative," he said.

Betty Mertens, director of the Tenderloin Counseling Services at 132 Jones St., remembers how she used to meet "friendly people" on the street. Even though Jones Street has long been full of conflict and poverty, she said, "I always felt that I would be protected if anything happened." But recently, Mertens said, some of her staff have been harassed and intimidated by street alcoholics and drug dealers.

Piccinini and Mertens are not the only ones bothered by the changes in these city blocks. In January 1990, a group of businesses and residents of the area sent a letter to District Attorney Arlo Smith, asking him to help "by actively prosecuting these marijuana dealers (who) we understand are not severely prosecuted."

But the business people received little support from the District Attorney's office, said Piccinini. "We never received an answer," he said. "City Hall has to start paying more attention to the business people of the area, and not only to the homeless. There has to be a balance."

Charlotte Martinez, head of the Narcotics Unit in the D.A.'s office, said the city has been stepping up its enforcement, noting that the number of marijuana dealers prosecuted citywide during the last three months has increased by almost 100 percent.

"We know the number of marijuana sales has increased. It is a real problem back on the streets," she said.

She said the city has not made marijuana enforcement a priority and the D.A.'s office does not have the manpower to combat the problem. According to Martinez, convicting marijuana sellers is a difficult task, considering the low priority given to the problem and jail overcrowding.

Michael Van Dyke, owner of the Psychedelic Shop at the corner of Market and Jones streets, said he has become increasingly concerned about the violence in the area. In the past few months, he said, two stabbings occurred, and last year one of his employees got a broken nose when he told some pan-handlers he did not have any money.

Sitting at his desk in his shop, which

According to Captain Thomas Murphy from Central Police Station, the police have done heavier patrolling in the area after receiving complaints from businesses.

"We have received complaints about people dealing marijuana, rude verbal remarks to women going by, drinking, and fighting," he said. The department has intensified patrolling during peak hours such as when people are going to or from work, Murphy added.

and political refugees from Latin America.

"Poverty creates violence here," said "El Foco" (the light bulb). Dressed in cowboy shirts or black t-shirts, he and a group of Latinos who sell marijuana on Jones Street are all not much older than 20. As one of them, the youngest, takes his sunglasses off and listens to El Foco talk about the violence on Jones Street, one sees his dark-skinned face is disfigured, with a red eye, purple bruises, and black swollen lips.

According to El Foco, fights and violence start when other groups on the street try to take advantage of them by stealing their money or marijuana.

Like Shaw, he thinks that physical violence is linked to alcoholism in the area. "People go crazy here under the influence of alcohol," he said.

Most of this group of marijuana sellers arrived in San Francisco during the past year and a half. They are here illegally and have no family or friends.

"We slept on the streets for six months in sleeping bags and cardboard boxes," said El Foco. "When it rained we used to stay in front of the theaters on Market Street." It was hard for them to keep a job in San Francisco, he added, because without work permits, they were often laid off without their pay or paid less than the minimum wage.

Tenderloin advocates, social workers, and some merchants emphasize that the city should create more employment, housing, and drug and alcohol treatment programs, as well as step up police patrols. Critics say that unless the situation on Jones Street is addressed, more crime and a flight of businesses await the area.

Carrol Sandy, an elderly homeless woman who lives in St. Anthony's Women's Shelter, sits in her wheelchair on the sunny side of Jones Street during the afternoons. "It is getting heavy and dangerous," she said, as she watched the sun go down from her sidewalk post. "But where can you go when there is no place to go? It's terrible."

Local residents and merchants say that since the Hibernia Bank and Herrington's pub closed their doors several years ago, lower Jones Street has hit hard times.

sells pipes, psychedelic posters, and incense, Van Dyke proposed some steps that the city could take to deal with the growing problem.

First, he said, the city should organize a cleanup day on Jones Street to show neighborhood residents that their community has not been abandoned. Second, the city should provide the area with social workers to address the problems of the people on the street.

Van Dyke said constant police enforcement is also crucial. "Somebody has to set the limits about social conduct on this street," he said. "Who wants to come here when people are urinating on the streets?"

But a complex problem arises when police are called in because homeless people and their advocates start to complain about police harassment, said Van Dyke, who differentiates between what he called "the real homeless" and "anti-social scammers."

Housing activist Randy Shaw agrees on the need for an increased presence. "The problem is not a homeless issue," he said, "it's a crime issue." The problem on Jones Street, Shaw said, is not that people are homeless but that many are dealing drugs and drinking in public. Shaw and others active in the neighborhood say they want the police to give the marijuana dealers a choice of either leaving the area or being arrested.

But the main issue, Shaw said, is "the drunkenness, the broken bottles, and problems associated with that. It's not simply people involved in drug trans-

An analysis of crime reports reveals that drug-related arrests along the first two blocks of Jones Street have skyrocketed in recent months. There were 23 times more marijuana arrests in March 1990 than in March 1989 (68 arrests in '90, as opposed to 3 in '89) and two-and-a-half times more cocaine arrests (24 in '90 versus 10 in '89).

The concentration of low-income housing, food lines, and shelters in the neighborhood brings hundreds of low-income and homeless people to the area every day, including many economic

by Joshua Merrow

The Tenderloin saw a dramatic decrease in reported violent crime last year, but the neighborhood is still beset by a disproportionately high crime rate, according to police reports.

Major reported crime in the Tenderloin dropped nine percent between Jan. 1 and Dec. 31, 1989. Some violent crimes fell more dramatically: there were 21 percent fewer rapes, 14 percent fewer strong-arm robberies, and 26 percent fewer aggravated (injurious) assaults in 1989 than there were in 1988.

Neighborhood activist Leroy Looper, who heads the Crime Abatement Committee, attributed the drop in crime to joint efforts by local residents and the police. "We've had captains who come to our meetings, to find out what the citizens have to say," he said. "That's good. Citizen participation is what reduces crime."

The city as a whole, however, experienced a rise in some types of reported violent crime. Police investigated 16 percent more rapes, 2.7 percent more strong-arm robberies, and 7.7 percent more assaults throughout the city.

Despite the neighborhood's drop in violent crime, the Tenderloin is still far from crime-free. In 1989, 15,630 crimes were reported in the area. These included 13 homicides, 45 rapes, 472 strong-arm robberies, and 692 aggravated assaults, as well as 988 non-aggravated assaults, 64 purse snatchings, 448 residential burglaries, and 468 auto thefts.

This means that the Tenderloin is home to 13.1 percent of the city's crime, a figure disproportionately high to the area's population. The Tenderloin houses three percent of the city's residents.

While the number of incidents has changed, their locations have not. For the past three years, most major crimes in the Tenderloin have been committed near Boeddeker Park. Four of the Tenderloin's homicides in 1989 (31 percent of the neighborhood total) were reported in the six-block area bounded by Turk, Ellis, Leavenworth and Mason streets. This area, known to the police as plot 176, was the scene of eight rapes (18 percent of total), 130 strong-arm robberies (28 percent), 197 aggravated assaults (28 percent), 74 residential burglaries (17 percent), eight purse-snatchings (13 percent), and 53 auto thefts (16 percent). By the numbers, plot 176 is the most dangerous in the city.

Looper sees the high crime around Boeddeker Park as a challenge to the community, stressing that kids' programs and other activities have to be coordinated in the park to attract "other kinds of people, besides drug dealers," whom he sees as responsible for the high crime rates.

Looper and other neighborhood activists have been pushing for more than a year for drug assets seizure funds to be allocated to the Tenderloin to fund recreational programs and two off-duty policemen in the park.

In 1989, plot 176 was most dangerous between 8 p.m. and 10 p.m., when 12 percent of the major crimes were committed, and between 10 p.m. and midnight, when 11 percent were committed. Crime activity tapered off in the early hours to reach its lowest point between 6 a.m. and 8 a.m., when three percent of the reported crimes were committed.

Neighboring plot 548 is almost as dangerous. Bounded by Turk, Geary, Larkin and Leavenworth streets, it was the scene of three homicides, nine rapes, 62 strong-arm robberies, 86 aggravated assaults, 66 residential burglaries, four purse snatchings, and 54 auto thefts.

Crime activity peaked there between

State Program Assists Victims Of Violent Crime

by Leslie Katz

The first thing Kevin knew when he came to on the sidewalk was that his head was pounding and that he had a nasty purple bruise on his right temple. He had been walking down Jones Street to Market when someone came up behind him and delivered a thunderous blow to his head. He was left semi-conscious, and his jacket pocket that had held the cash from his paycheck was empty.

Fortunately, friends chipped in to help Kevin meet his living expenses. But he didn't know that he and other victims of violent crimes are eligible for funds through the state's Victim's Witness Assistance Program. Established in 1965 by the California State Legislature, this program financially assists victims of violent crimes as well as helping them maneuver through the courts concerning their particular cases.

The program's services include legal and medical reimbursement, referrals, advocacy, and benefits for job re-training in cases where injuries have interfered with work ability. Last fiscal year, the program helped more than 3,000 crime victims, outlaying more than $1 million in benefits.

The program provides services to victims of violent crimes such as muggings, robberies, homicides, sexual abuse, and assault, as well as to their family members who have suffered physical and/or emotional injury as a direct result of a crime.

"Victims are already experiencing the burden of questioning their self-worth," said Randy Schell, a claims specialist at the Victim's Witness Assistance Program office in San Francisco. "Having financial needs taken care of gives them more time to concentrate on their feelings and how the crime impacts their family."

However, only crime victims who are uninsured or have limited coverage can receive help from this service. To qualify for assistance, the applicant must meet three requirements:

1. The applicant must be a victim of an act of violence.
2. The crime must be reported to the police, sheriff, highway patrol, or other law enforcement agency.
3. The applicant must cooperate with law enforcement officials in the investigation and prosecution of any known suspects.

For more information on the Victim's Witness Assistance Program call 553-9044. Other victims' advocacy groups include:

10 p.m. and midnight, when 13 percent of the crimes were committed, and was safest between 4 a.m. and 6 a.m., when four percent of crimes were committed.

The safest area in the Tenderloin is plot 554, which comprises City Hall and the block east of it, bounded by Van Ness, Larkin, McAllister and Grove streets. It was the scene of one rape, four strong-arm robberies, six aggravated assaults, 13 non-aggravated assaults, one purse-snatching, and nine auto-thefts. No homicides were reported, and there are no residences in the area to burglarize.

Plot 554 was crime-free between 12 a.m. and 2 a.m. for all of 1989. Otherwise, 16 percent of the area's crimes occurred between 8 p.m. and 10 p.m., 15 percent during lunch hour (12 p.m. to 2 p.m.) and 14 percent between 2 p.m. and 4 p.m.

To many, the Tenderloin's 1989 decrease in violent crime may come as a surprise.

"[The decrease] certainly goes contrary to public opinion," said Central Police Captain Tom Murphy. He noted that some crimes draw public attention to the neighborhood which can skew the public's perception of crime in the area.

Murphy said he couldn't speculate on connections with police activity in the area and the decrease in crime. Instead he linked the opening up of new businesses in the neighborhood as helping reduce crime.

"We really work the hell out of that area," he said. "But we've been doing that for a long time. I hope we had something to do with it." he said.

blocks away. The new location is smaller, with only one ring, but Don Stewart, who has run the gym since Newman's death, says its smaller size makes it easier to manage.

Stewart has worked with great boxers such as former heavyweight champions George Foreman and Sonny Liston, as well as countless inner-city kids, businessmen, and forgotten fighters who learned the game at Newman's Gym. He has been at the gym for more than 20 years, and he's been in the boxing game even longer, although he says, "Nobody stays in the boxing game."

According to Stewart, boxers come in two basic types. "One's a slugger," he says, "a body puncher. The other is a kid that can move around like a ballet dancer."

"I teach the fundamentals. The main thing is the jab. The jab is the most important punch. They don't teach a teaching them the basics, keeping them off the streets and showing them there's more to life than trouble.

Eighty-four-year-old trainer Johnny Videl, another San Francisco institution, is often at Newman's Gym working with one of his current prospects. Videl has trained more than 600 amateur champions since he quit fighting 70 years ago.

"I had four pro fights," Videl recalls, "but my mother asked me to quit, so I retired. In those days there were only four round fights, because ten rounds weren't legalized until 1925."

Videl remembers the heyday of San Francisco boxing, when cards were held nearly every week at faded memories like National Hall in the Mission, and the Dreamland Rink, where the main floor moved down to the basement and up again, with the boxers waiting beneath the stands until the ring came down to get them.

The regulars at Newman's stress the discipline needed to succeed as a boxer. "If a guy really wants to do it, he's got to dedicate himself," said Tony Bosnich, a one-time boxer and referee who is a member of the San Francisco Sports Hall of Fame.

Danny Christenson, a Tenderloin resident who boxed in the Golden Gloves as a kid in New York, said: "In that game you gotta live by the rules. If you're a playboy, you're going nowhere."

Forty years ago and more, many city kids boxed, often because they were brawling at school or in the streets anyway. Videl and Stewart say modern distractions and the rising popularity of other sports have made kids less keen on boxing. They also say the city lacks the promoters that once made San Francisco a big boxing town.

"Kids had more opportunities to box back then," said Stewart, a self-proclaimed 'paisano' from North Beach, who used to get in fights regularly in school. "There were hungry fighters then, they used to fight to survive."

"Kids have too many distractions," agreed Videl. "Football, basketball. In those days, you didn't have cars. You didn't have TV."

Nonetheless, Newman's Gym lives on, with a long and colorful history and a new youthful crop of boxers, including Tom Maguire and Alex Santiago, starting their careers alongside the likes of local favorite 'trish' Pat Lawlor.

Wearing green shoes, green trunks and green gloves, Lawlor recently ran his pro record to 13-1 with a victory in front of a hometown crowd at the Civic Auditorium. Lawlor took some time off after his last bout, but it won't be long before he'll be back in the ring at Newman's Gym, preparing for the next one.

good job anymore.

"You've got to teach a fighter how to move his hands. Give him a lot of compliments, bring him along slow. If you bring him along easy," advises Stewart, "he'll turn out to be a good boxer."

Stewart, like his predecessor Newman, has spent a lot of time with kids,

Red Tape Delays Arrival of Viet Political Prisoners

by Joe Tran

Despite political fanfare last year when the United States announced it had reached an agreement with Vietnam to release up to 100,000 former Vietnamese political prisoners, the numbers of those prisoners and other Vietnamese immigrants actually reaching the States is well below U.S. expectations. But at a recent meeting in San Jose, a Department of State official urged Bay Area Vietnamese not to lose hope about relatives still awaiting resettlement.

"We don't want people to leave by boat. It's too dangerous," said Senior Deputy of State Robert Funseth, who urged people to use legal departure programs instead. "They are robbed, attacked, raped, killed, as you know. Please urge your people not to lose patience."

Funseth was one of several government officials who spoke at the Symposium on Vietnamese Political Prisoners March 17 in San Jose, attended by more than 300 Vietnamese leaders, local government officials, and refugee resettlement workers. He reported that since the beginning of this year more than 1,000 former Vietnamese political prisoners have emigrated from Vietnam to the United States, and he projected another 7,000 would arrive by the end of September.

The numbers fall short of those projected earlier by the U.S. State Department, which had hoped that as many as 1,000 political prisoners would arrive in the United States every month starting in October 1989. The United States and Vietnam signed an agreement in July 1989 that set the stage for up to 100,000 former Vietnamese political prisoners and their families to immigrate to the United States during the next few years.

Funseth attributed the slow movement to the backlog of cases in Vietnam. In addition to political prisoners, some 500,000 other Vietnamese are on a waiting list for emigration to the United States through the Orderly Departure Program. Many who have already been screened and approved by the United States have difficulty obtaining required medical examinations and confirmed flight reservations out of Vietnam. Both matters are out of the United States' control, Funseth said, since the medical exams are under Vietnam's authority and the refugees' transportation is the responsibility of the International Organization for Migration.

"So far we have had 26,439 people interviewed (by U.S. officials), Funseth said, "but only 10,117 of this number are on the departure waiting list and only 3,194 have confirmed flights out."

Funseth was optimistic that by the end of September a total of 51,000 Vietnamese—including Amerasians, family reunification cases, humanitarian parole cases, people with immigrant status, and political prisoners—would emigrate to the United States. And by 1994, Funseth estimated, a total of 250,000 Vietnamese will resettle in the United States.

In a question and answer period, Funseth said the length of time to process resettlement applications varies considerably from case to case. "No typical amount of time can be given," he said. "Please urge your folks not to lose patience."

Funseth also emphasized that any former political prisoner is eligible for resettlement in the United States, including those without relatives here. "If you know of any case of a person who was denied and should be eligible, don't hesitate to write to the State Department," he said.

The Symposium on Vietnamese Political Prisoners was sponsored by State Senator Art Torres, the Coalition of Nationalist Organizations of Northern California, and the Indochinese Resettlement and Cultural Center in San Jose.

FRED Program Under Fire

tion that those disqualified from aid will be off the rolls for 20 months, but Weiner, who conducted the IRP FRED study, said that most applicants successfully reapply for aid within a month.

"I would agree with anyone who said the numbers are wrong," said Michael Hancock, chief administrator of FRED. "The data on the DSS recipients is just not out there."

Under the FRED Spotlight

Hancock said it was not the program's intent to intimidate anyone. "We understand the opinions that are going on around us," he said. "We're not trying to pull any Sunday punches." Although counties may opt not to implement the program, counties that do implement FRED receive state and federal funds to defray the costs of its administration. Hancock estimated the $350,000 FRED program could save the city between $2 million and $3 million annually—and $772,000 in fraudulent AFDC payments alone.

But Weiner said the city will pay a price. The program may cut off thousands of needy people from aid, she warned. "We are already seeing two to five people a day in our offices with FRED-related problems," she said, adding that many people will not even apply for benefits because they fear the intrusion and intimidation of investigations.

Weiner and other welfare advocates charged that the FRED program violates welfare recipients' right to privacy. They want the department to stop its investigations and concentrate instead on reducing social workers' caseloads, lessening their paperwork burden and making the application process more humane.

An applicant would come under the FRED program's spotlight if he or she met two of six criteria, including not being able to verify their social security information, work history, or means of support prior to seeking aid. Among the other criteria for investigation by FRED is having been denied aid in the past for providing contradictory information or having lived in three or more counties within the last year.

Critics charge these criteria are overly broad and lead to arbitrary and routine investigations. During its one-month history the FRED program has investigated 75 people out of a total of 31,600 applicants and recipients, finding fraud in approximately 30 percent of the cases investigated, according to FRED Supervisor Juan Galvan.

The primary investigative tool employed by FRED, and the most highly criticized one, is the unannounced home visit.

A young AFDC recipient described her experience with FRED investigators at an informational meeting on the program organized by welfare rights groups on March 22. She explained that during a surprise visit, the investigator looked through her closet and her dresser drawers and questioned her about her clothing and whether her baby was, in fact, hers. Her friend, with whom the young woman was staying, was astonished by the investigation. "I think they're trying to make people feel bad," she said. "They've been sneaking around in her privacy with these visits."

Barbara Nabors-Glass, co-director of the Income Rights Project, said she is AIDS/ARC Vigil Gains City Support: In a vote of support for the four-year-old ARC/AIDS vigil protest at United Nations Plaza, the Board of Supervisors moved last month to grant the encampment a six-month lease with the city. Sponsored by Supervisor Harry Britt, the new resolution, which awaits Mayor Art Agnos' signature, was initiated to protect the protesters from city harassment. Last summer, police attempted to roust the campers as part of a city sweep of the homeless at Civic Center. Fourteen people staff the 24-hour vigil in front of the old federal building as part of an international appeal for action on AIDS prevention and treatment.

dismayed at what she sees as a clear violation of privacy. "There's no way that a woman should have to open her drawers and show her underwear to prove she's living somewhere," she said.

Weiner said the investigators' home visits violate AFDC regulations because investigators do not inform clients they are coming. "The regulations are very clear," she said. "They have to get the client's authorization for any third-party contact or home visit."

Vera said DSS has a "different" interpretation of the regulations. "Clients give their consent to be investigated when they apply for benefits," he said, referring to the waiver applicants must sign to receive benefits that states they are subject to investigations.

G.A. Advocacy Project Coordinator Judy Blochwiak questioned how well clients were informed of what they were signing. "You wait in line all day, and when your turn comes, they hand you six separate documents and say 'sign here,'" she said. "They don't really explain them to you at all."

A former G.A. recipient, Cecilia Esguerra, agreed. "Their job is to disqualify you. They put you through hell."

Another client Weiner represents said FRED investigators came to her temporary residence and made her show them all her clothes and belongings. Weiner, who was present during the visit, said the investigator repeatedly grilled her client and insisted there were not enough belongings to account for the three children she was collecting benefits for.

"We have to ask those kinds of questions," FRED Supervisor Galvan said. "In that particular case, it turned out the woman was collecting benefits for two people that were not her children and have been living out of state for the last eight months."

The seven investigators for the FRED program were recruited from eligibility workers from the AFDC and G.A. departments. But the recruitment within these departments has caused a labor shortage in an agency that is already understaffed and overworked, according to insiders.

"Our concern regarding FRED is that it draws off eligibility workers, increasing AFDC caseloads per worker between 25 and 50 percent," said Max Butler, president of Local 535, the Service Employees International. "The caseload should be 142 per worker, but is now generally around 175 to 200," he said.

"This tends to dehumanize the eligibility worker and creates bad morale," Butler said. "These (clients) are not just folders, they're real live people."

At the G.A. office, eligibility workers are even more burdened. Program Manager Liz Strand said the number of cases has been on the rise since she took over last June, topping 10,000 cases per month last December. "The caseload per worker is 227, and it will stay that high until we get those workers replaced," Strand said. She said an acceptable caseload would be 170.

"We have vacancies all over the department," DSS Assistant General Manager John Vera acknowledged. "There are 11 in AFDC alone." The department plans to fill these positions as soon as possible, he said.

Galvan said the unit will keep careful track of its progress, and stressed that FRED is still in the pilot stages. "We know the Income Rights Project wants to put us out of business," Galvan said, adding that if the costs of the program prove to outweigh the benefits, the program will be phased out.

All kinds of parks are popping up in the central city: the Ellis Street proposed playground site, Folsom Street Park, and now one in the backyard of the Nathan Building developed by the Indochinese Housing Development Corporation and built by the San Francisco Conservation Corps.

There have been meetings about making improvements in the operation of Boeddeker Park. There's a survey around in which you (the community) can make your voice heard. See Boeddeker staff to get a copy of the survey. The janitorial staff at the park is working real hard to keep the sand clean, free of needles, trash, etc. But if you think more needs to be done, contact your community advocacy group, NOMPC, and let's see if we can help.

Midnite Caller shot a scene at Boeddeker last month. Our basketball players became stars. I heard they were well fed and paid—next stop Hollywood.

Practice doesn't always make perfect. The Boeddeker Park girls' volleyball team lost three straight games at the Chinese Center volleyball tournament. Better luck next year.

Two of the Tenderloin's local heroes, J.B. and Penny P., are back in the neighborhood—J.B. back from working in the Mission, saying the TL is his real home, and Penny P. back from a long, deserved vacation in Northern California and Nevada. Penny came back to find the Living Room closed for repairs and having to hire new staff.

Penny is calling on more Tenderloin agencies to set up drop-in centers for Tenderloin residents and homeless people. "There's a great need for drop-in center space," said Penny, who has found in her work at the Living Room that when you simply open the door, offer a safe and comfortable space with a coffee pot, friendships blossom.

Maria Manor resident Ed McDonald died on March 4, and was honored at a memorial by friends and neighbors at the Maria. According to longtime friend Leslie Kline, Ed was into "Buddhism, Hinduism, Salvation Armyism, Recoveryism and a hundred other isms." Ed also served a term as president of the Maria tenants' association.

The memorial was a tear-filled affair, but many of the mourners traded fond stories about Ed and had a good laugh. One pointed out that Ed loved to make puns and speak in metaphors, and she finds it appropriate that he died on "March Forth."

There are 12 Koshland Fellows in the Tenderloin: Puthera Chuop, David Tran, Midge Wilson, Kelly Cullen, Richard Livingston, Louella Lee, Keith Grier, Sara Colm, Nancy Ong, Diana Wong, Mary Dickey, and John Philbrook. The Koshland awards are given annually to recognize outstanding community leaders at the neighborhood level. There will be a big bash to honor the Tenderloin awardees at the Main Library on Sunday, May 6 from 2-4 p.m.

Happy 95th birthday to Mike Sorensen (March 28), native son of Denmark, resident of the Cadillac, and a San Franciscan since 1919. Mike worked in the newspaper trade, and says he owes his longevity to "clean living."

Hold these dates: A workshop on Solutions to Poverty, sponsored by the 509 Cultural Center, will be held Saturday, April 28 from 3-5 p.m. at the Cadillac Hotel, 380 Eddy St. Check out the Lao band at the Lao and Cambodian Spring Festival, Saturday, April 7 at Boeddeker Park. And the third annual Tenderloin Walkathon will be held Sunday, April 22, starting with registration at 11:30 a.m. at Fulton and Larkin streets. The walk begins at 12:30 p.m., followed by a street carnival on Leavenworth Street between Eddy and Ellis. The walkathon supports three agencies that work to make life better for the children of the Tenderloin: the Bay Area Women's Resource Center, Tenderloin Youth Advocates, and North of Market Child Development Center.

The Tenderloin Community Children's Center will have a fundraiser at the Parc 55 Hotel on Wed., April 4. Dig deep and support this worthwhile project.

Ed Scott, Canandaigua representative (makers of Wild Irish Rose), came to a Safe and Sober Streets Committee meeting last month to say that their sweet wine is not being distributed in the Tenderloin any more and we should not see any of it on local store shelves. But while strolling through the Arlington Market, SASS spotted a whole shelf full of the dessert wine. Scott said he would take SASS's concerns back to New York, and that his company will respond to the problem his product presents in our community.

Jamal Jawad, co-owner of the Arlington Market, asked SASS to support video games at his new market at 128 Eddy St. The committee would accept the video games permit if it would be reviewed every six months.

Hey, SFPD, take a long look at the Ritz Bar on the 500 block of Jones. There is a lot of bad karma around that bar.

There is a new Vietnamese piano bar in the 200 block of Leavenworth, where Arturo's Mexican restaurant used to be. The place is not actually a bar, but a coffee shop. A piano coffee shop?

Michael and Denise Deshay had their 11th anniversary last month.

Frances Middleton, 66, longtime TL resident and activist/actress, passed away on Mon., March 26, at the Coming Home Hospice. Frances left many friends in the neighborhood, where she lived for 10 years. She was a member of the Cadillac Players before they became EXTheatre, and her smiling face can be seen on the Faces of the Tenderloin sculpture in Boeddeker Park. A memorial for Frances is being planned by her friend Diana Samuelson of the Tenderloin Senior Organizing Project for Saturday, April 14, at 1 p.m., in the mezzanine of the Alexander Hotel at 230 Eddy St.

Barbara Neal, one of the Tenderloin's own, is working on a new film dealing with child abuse, a real timely subject.

Glide's AIDS Festival went real well. Food from Popeye's Chicken, booths with informational material, and just a good time. Let's do it again.

SFPD's Rich Benjamin: you are a good cop. Now everyone knows it, even if you don't like your name in print.

I promise that this is my last comment on the Tenderloin Neighborhood Development Corporation. TNDC missed the point. There's no argument that TNDC helped when the 509 Cultural Center needed it. And the 509 hasn't stopped needing their help. Making money as a non-profit doesn't mean the 509 has surplus dollars and is looking for a place to spend it, it means that new, improved programming and materials, and extended staff and hours of operation are finally possible. Funding sources want to support programming, not provide rent subsidies.

The neighborhood's relationship with TNDC must continue to be mutually supportive and beneficial. The 509 could not have opened without TNDC and cannot continue without them. We thanked them then, and continue to openly appreciate their support of our efforts, but let's face it, they need us as much as we need them. One part of the mission of TNDC is to encourage cooperative management and ownership of the properties held by that agency. By increasing the rent at the 509, they not only diminish our opportunity for cooperative ownership, worse yet, they jeopardize the 509's continued existence in the community.

Solutions to Poverty Workshop

Dear Tenderloin Neighbors,

You are invited to a Solutions to Poverty Workshop.

The purpose of this workshop is to create guidelines for national anti-poverty legislation—one comprehensive bill that would meet the needs of all poor people—children, single parents, workers, unemployed, retired, or disabled. We want to determine what it would take to abolish poverty in the United States.

We will do our own research and will meet as many times as needed to develop a solid program. After we have formed our conclusions, we will invite San Franciscans from other neighborhoods to discuss our proposals. Together, we will consider additional changes to those proposals.

We will then inform the public about our recommendations and encourage political organizations to persuade out elected representatives to support legislation based on these proposals.

We hope that all our neighbors will take part in this workshop. Please phone ahead (346-1308) so that study materials will be available for all attendees. Thank you.

Sincerely,

BUSINESS

everybody's business

This walk down Geary Street is the second part of a two-part series on the business life of distinct and colorful Tenderloin streets.

by Liz Price

Geary Street is the only street in San Francisco that stretches from Market Street to the beach, Street, with the Edinburgh Castle, 950 Geary St., a traditional Scottish pub that serves pints of ale, fish and chips, and features bagpipe players. Nearby is Sam Da Do restaurant, 937 Geary St., where you can enjoy rare Korean delicacies. Continuing east you come to the Geary Steakhouse, 901 Larkin St. at the corner of Geary Street, where owner Eric winding its way through distinctive neighborhoods along the way. The street was named in the 1850s for John White Geary, the first mayor and postmaster of San Francisco and the last Alcalde of the city (Spanish for governor). The section of Geary Street that threads through the Tenderloin offers an eclectic mix of cultures, businesses, and culinary sensations.

The eastern end of the Tenderloin's section of Geary Street begins near Polk Azaravand serves burgers, steaks, and french fries at reasonable prices.

Also near Larkin Street, you can try a Middle Eastern sandwich or a Greek pastry at Pari's Deli, 842 Geary St. The new Goodwill Thrift Store at 822 Geary St. is the next stop for bargain-minded shoppers. For Southeast Asian food, Anh Hong Phu Nhuan Restaurant, 808 Geary St., offers Vietnamese lunch and dinner, and the Siam Cafe, 807 Geary St., is one of the best places for Thai food in the city.

At the corner of Hyde Street is Downtown T.V., 778 Geary St., a closet-sized shop where you can get a great deal on used electronic equipment. Geary Street even has its own herb store, Meng Tak Herb and Ginseng Shop, 706 Geary St., owned by Peter Kia Tak Chan, a certified acupuncturist who sells all kinds of Chinese medicine.

The Blue Lamp Lounge, 561 Geary St., is a neighborhood tavern where live music plays nightly in a friendly and welcoming atmosphere.

Geary Street's Old World theme continues at the Irish Castle Gift Store, 537 Geary St., which is stocked with unusual Irish gifts, multitudes of green t-shirts, and Irish mugs.

La Mere Duquesne is an excellent and well-hidden French restaurant at 101 Shannon—an alley off Geary Street between Jones and Leavenworth streets. Owner Gilbert Duquesne likes to offer seasonal discounts in his eatery during the winter restaurant doldrums. Duquesne is offering a "tax relief" special up until April 15: $5.40 for lunch and $10.40 for dinner. Other upcoming specials on the calendar are Easter weekend, April 14-15, Mother's Day, May 12-13, and Memorial Day weekend, May 26-28. Duquesne says his business triples when he offers the specials. "The restaurant is crowded and everyone has a great time," he says.

Among the auto shops, restaurants, and thrift stores of Geary Street is one store that doesn't have any competition; the Aquarium, 758 Geary. Owned by Sing Chin, the Aquarium sells brightly colored, exotic tropical fish. Chin, who has owned the business for two years, says that his unusual pet store is important to people's well-being. "If you are tired, you can look at fish and feel better," he says, confiding, "I have some people come in and tell me that they have stopped drinking because they have fish. Better than paying all that money to see a psychiatrist."

Chin sells hundreds of fish from all over the world. Mostly he stocks salt water varieties, which need heated tanks. Fresh water or cold water varieties have much simpler needs. One of his favorites is the salt water Silver Arawanas, a rare fish from the Amazon.

Chin would eventually like to design large fish tanks (200 gallons or more) for offices and corporations. But for now Chin is content with selling to individual customers who want a small tank with a few fish.

It's hard to miss the Aquarium, where more often than not a crowd of people will be standing out front, gazing wide eyed at the fish tanks in the window.

"We have a lot of people come in and just look at the fish," Chin says. "I don't mind. I make a little money, but I also help people. I think I am helping the neighborhood in some way."

Unit Park, a downtown corporation, seems to have taken over control of the parking lots in the Tenderloin. Unit Park now owns lots on O'Farrell, Golden Gate and Jones streets, Turk and Jones streets, and Eddy and Taylor streets. According to residents and business owners, the rates in these lots have risen sharply or even doubled shortly after Unit Park assumed ownership. Unit Park also seems to have purchased other parking lots around the city.

The United Nations Plaza Association, an association of businesses and merchants, has teamed up with St. Anthony Foundation to establish Project Hope, whose aim is to hire St. Anthony clients to help clean Tenderloin streets. The kick-off for the one-month trial run is April 4. At its monthly meeting, the UNPA discussed at length the AIDS/ARC vigil at U.N. Plaza. The association adopted the position of supporting the vigil in principle, but not as a permanent part of the plaza.

When Ginger's Too Cocktail Lounge on Sixth Street celebrated its Third Annual Handicapped Ball on March 4, Gloria Harrison, who lives at 54 McAllister St., was the first reveler to arrive. "Ginger's is the best tavern in town in terms of sociable people and friendly atmosphere," she declared. Discount meals and drinks were available to the handicapped and disabled people who dropped by throughout the evening at the little bar tucked away in "The Wine Country" of South of Market. Ginger's regular Alton Williams organized the ball this year, and he credits bar owner Don Rogers with the annual event's continued success. "This is our place too," said Williams, "and that's because of Don's generosity and hospitality." Busy behind the bar, Don said: "It's not exactly a benefit, but just a ball for the people who come here to have some fun." Meanwhile, back at the celebrants' table, Gloria was joined by friends Karl Ossagen and Charles Tinay Crocker. Ginger's is a fine place for Irish fans of the opera, Crocker said. Gloria had pro-Irish stickers attached to her wheelchair. "I'm for peaceful reunification of Ireland," she said, and everyone at the table lifted a glass.

Lorraine Hansberry Theatre

Night Time is the Right Time for Singing the Blues

by Keiko Ohnuma

Ladies, when was the last time your man gave you the blues? He may think "wild women don't have the blues"—but you know better than that, sister. Blues is to jazz what man is to woman, so listen up and hear it told by three women who should know.

In "Blues in the Night," at the Lorraine Hansberry Theatre through April 7, creator Sheldon Epps opens an intimate window into the prototypical lives and attitudes of Chicago bluesmen—and women—of the 1920s and '30s.

The setting is one lonely night in a cheap hotel, where three blues-filled ladies of the jazz age caress their memories of men, music, and mood, mingling delight and disappointment in an easy sway.

Polished, yes—but this musical revue is no prim parade. Under the smooth-but-tight direction of Stanley E. Williams, local singers Denise Perrier, Mechelle la Chaux, Carla Vaughn, and Andre Andree move from sad to mad, glad to bad as they recreate the showmanship of the old blues singers.

Slipping into and out of metallic-neon gowns, slips, boas, and feathered hats, the Lady From the Road, the Woman of the World, and the Girl With a Date belt out two dozen sweet, soulful, bawdy, and thoroughly entertaining classics of American roots music, punctuated by the bad-boy bravado of the Saloon Singer. "Wild women don't worry; I say they don't ever get the blues," he croons.

Denise Perrier plays Bessie Smith and threatens to steal the show with a couple of hilariously raunchy numbers that coax the audience into hoots and howls. The vocal strengths of these women are well matched, with La Chaux's sensual voice and Vaughn's sweet and nostalgic tones adding counterpoint to Perrier's powerful, sock-it-to-you blues.

Creator Epp has chosen a representative selection of songs from the likes of Bessie Smith and Alberta Hunter—infused with the influence of jazz greats Harold Arlen, Johnny Mercer, and Andy Razaf. The songs also illustrate the appeal of this music as the voice of emotion, passion, and love as they weave the hard-luck histories of characters who have sung their way through smokey bars and back alley clubs, their sadness firing their music and planting the seeds of the soulful sound in performers as diverse as Anita Baker and the Rolling Stones. Indeed, it's the sad things in life that leave you "singing the blues"—yet the music itself brings consolation, and by the end of this lonely night "when the blues is all you got to depend on," the singers and the band break into bright, rocking celebration.

Horns Julius Melendez and Rita Thies do a great job of weaving their own sensual sorrow into the jazzier numbers, while the deep-blue to purple to sunset-orange of the sky in Tim Miller's cityscape set creates the right mood mix somewhere between the Johnny Carson Show and the old 181 Club on Eddy Street around 4 a.m.—and if you've been there, mama, you've surely had the blues.

So take a tip from the ladies: Forget about that man. The blues is one thing that'll stay with you through the night.

The bluesy persuasion of jazz singers (l-r) Mechelle LaChaux, Denise Perrier, Carla Vaughn, and Andre Andree will keep you rocking, laughing and crying—and singing the blues—at the Lorraine Hansberry Theater's production of "Blues in the Night," running through April 7.

Cab Strike the Backdrop for Drama on Workers' Struggle

by Keiko Ohnuma

Searching for the North Beach Repertory's playhouse on Golden Gate Avenue, I came across an alley where a group of men were standing around and pawing the ground with their shoes.

"Is this the theater?" I asked. "No," someone barked. "It's a union hall."

Union hall it was: 1930s style, with fringed banners draping the stage on which a podium stood, facing a row of folding chairs. Disoriented theatergoers weaved through the aisles to their seats, while actors in fedoras milled about tossing coins, shuffling cards and looking nervously at the door, "Where is he?" they muttered, referring to Lefty.

This nice piece of staging sets the mood for the evening. Given what they have to work with (at least on the first preview night)—an old meeting hall, scavenged props, glaring white lights, and hardly any sound design to speak of—North Beach Repertory makes it look easy to hold an audience's interest in Clifford Odets' Depression-era play "Waiting for Lefty."

Drama is all you get here. Even the script, built on vignettes that unfold the history of the massive taxicab drivers' strike of 1934, is stuffed full of cliches and pat answers that might have been embarrassing in less skillful hands.

The politics of the play, for one thing, are cartoonishly simplistic. All social ills can be blamed on the "money men," whose manipulations make it impossible for honest men and women to make ends meet. The afflictions created by an unjust economic system come between husband and wife, mother and daughter, brother and brother in the seven vignettes, eventually leading each person to confront the real enemy: the forces that make them choose between economic survival and moral integrity.

This good guys/bad guys theme replete with tacky lines ("I'm so sick of being a dog I could choke. . . The cards are all stacked against us.") might be a tad dull for a '90s audience if it weren't for the actors, who bring to life the gestures and speech of the 1930s.

Clearly a social-reformer, Odets deliberately kept the politics of "Lefty" simple to persuade working men and women to stand up to the system in an age when American labor was reaching its height. It is not surprising, then, if rage lends a painfully dogmatic tenor to some of the scenes, such as the one in which a young scientist loses his job rather than spying on a colleague who works with chemical weapons.

With each of his refusals, the big bad corporation man calmly ups his buyoff offer by 10 percent, then fires the young scientist with "no hard feelings" when he finds the idealist can't be bought.

The good guy's comeback is predictably satisfying: "Sure, hard feelings! I'm not the civilized type, Mr. Fayette," he crows, "Nothing suave or sophisticated about me!" And he socks the corporation man in the jaw.

Transparent as its themes may be, "Waiting for Lefty" seems to carry special meaning for North Beach Rep director Anthony St. Martin, who studied acting under Stella Adler, an original member of The Group Theater, which first staged "Lefty." Indeed, technique — perhaps Adler's — shines through the cliches in North Beach Rep's spirited performance.

Like most new theater groups, the two-year-old company is short on space for rehearsal and performance, which is why their collaboration with local unions on this show is so fortunate. For theater lovers who have never been involved in organized labor or been to a union meeting, an evening at Local 14 in the Tenderloin may bring new meaning to the term "political theater."

"Waiting for Lefty" runs through April 29 at Local Theater 14, 247 Golden Gate Ave., at 8 p.m. Thurs.-Sat., and 7 p.m. on Sundays. Tickets: $10. Call 285-1786 for more information.

This gaggle of gregarious artists—including muralist Johanna Poethig—produced the new "Flying Dogs Breathing Fire" mural at Boeddeker Park Recreation Center.

If Dogs Could Fly: New Fantasy Mural Unveiled at Boeddeker

by David Armstrong

Three dogs—yellow, brown, and green—spew flames of red fire from their gaping mouths as they soar across a backdrop of clouds on the wall of Boeddeker Recreation Center. Created by artist Johanna Poethig and children from the center's art class, "Flying Dogs Breathing Fire" is the title of the center's new ceramic tile mural.

Searching for a subject for this collaborative work, Poethig, who calls herself an "artist in community" and a "cultural activist," first had all the Boeddeker art class students draw pictures of dogs. The three winning dogs—by Baron DeShay, Chhoeut Sun, and Shawn Johnson—were incorporated into the mural's design.

Poethig copied the outline of the three images onto tile, and then directed the youngsters in painting the tiles at the center's weekly art classes. The children colored the background with a blue sky and puffy white clouds. After firing the tiles in a kiln, Poethig returned with the jigsaw puzzle pieces that would become this lively piece of art, measuring 10 feet by 15 feet.

Last year, Poethig directed the creation of another Boeddeker art project, a 15-foot ceramic dragon with a monkey riding on its back and several small birds fluttering around its head. The dragon decorates the wall opposite the flying canines.

Poethig, 33, grew up in the Philippines and speaks fluent Tagalog. She attended the University of California at Santa Cruz. She has painted murals both north and south of Market, directing the mural at the South of Market Cultural Center and the Center for South East Asian Refugee Resettlement on O'Farrell Street.

Boeddeker's free art class, sponsored by the Bay Area Women's Resource Center, is held on Mondays at 5:30 p.m. for children five to fourteen years of age. For more information call 292-2019 or 474-2400.

Homeless Kids' Art Exhibit Depicts Life on the Brink

by Leslie Katz

The desires, fears, and hopes of San Francisco's homeless youth were poignantly expressed in the first Larkin Street Youth Center Art Show, which opened with a reception for the artists on March 15 at the Central YMCA. The work of more than 70 teenagers was represented in the exhibit, which was co-sponsored by the Museum of Children's Art in Oakland.

"The show gives an unthreatening, even inviting look at the lives of the children we see on the streets and walk quickly by to get away from," said Peter Carpou, who operates the youth center's art program. "The children's voices are often silent or fall on deaf ears. We need to heed their expression."

With images ranging from black skulls and syringes dripping blood to pastel still lifes and watercolor landscapes, the diverse exhibit reflected the wide range of experience and emotion which characterizes the troubled youths' lives.

"Some of these kids are so afraid to speak about what they are experiencing that the images express what can't be said," said Carpou, who was an art instructor at San Quentin prison before he came to the Larkin Street center. "A lot of the kids have suffered abuse, and living on the street, the victimization continues."

One piece of art was simply a white sheet of paper with the word "SURVIVE" scrawled across it in bold black letters. Others conveyed powerful warnings: "AIDS: stop thinking it could never happen," "Using dirty needles is like putting a loaded gun to your head," and "Your life is a terrible thing to waste, so don't."

While many of the works were surprisingly sophisticated, Carpou said that self-expression—and not technical mastery—is what he emphasizes when working with the kids. He observed that art gives them valuable time away from the chaos of the streets, time to relax and reflect.

Michael Starr, who had several works displayed in the show, explained that his series of pictures was indicative of his tumultuous personal journey, a path which has included drugs and despair. "I've been to hell and back," he said.

One of Starr's pictures depicted a blackbird flying away from an exploding mythical castle. "The castle, the home, is disappearing," he explained, "and the blackbird is flying away to find his own way."

A muted chalk drawing of a hand reaching skyward from a whirling sea of color was symbolic of the pain felt at his lowest point, Starr explained.

His own favorite work of the series, a mountainous landscape, conveyed hope. "This one brings me back down to myself, to the peace I had before, and that I am coming into once more," said Starr, who has been clean of drugs for about a month. "The clouds," he said, "the mountain scene, the lake... it's just so serene."

Supervisor Terence Hallinan lauded the youth center for its commitment to homeless youth. "One has only to look at these moving pictures to appreciate how much Larkin Street Youth Center has done to give these children a new lease on life and a second chance," he said.

More than 100 works were displayed at the show, many of which are for sale. For more information, call Peter Carpou at the Larkin Street Youth Center, 673-0911.

NOTICE OF PROPOSED SETTLEMENT OF CLASS ACTION

A settlement of a class action lawsuit presently pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California entitled JIMMIE SMITH et al. v. FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY et al, Civil No. C 90-0161 EFL, is now being considered, and the Court will consider objections to the settlement on March 30, 1990. The lawsuit is a class action filed on behalf of persons who claim to have been injured by the alleged failure of the California Department of Social Services ("DSS") and the Federal Emergency Management Agency ("FEMA") to comply with certain disaster relief laws in connection with the provisions of the federally-funded benefits to persons affected by the Loma Prieta earthquake of October 17, 1989. This notice is directed to all persons who:

- (1) applied for and were denied rental assistance by FEMA because they shared housing or had not been in their pre-earthquake residence for thirty continuous days;
- (2) appealed or wished to appeal a grant or denial of rental assistance; or
- (3) did not appeal a grant or denial of Individual and Family Grant benefits provided by DSS because of the time-limit to appeal.

If you fall into one of these three categories, you may be a class member.

Among other things, the settlement requires:

- (1) provision of certain housing assistance, if needed, to individuals who were denied FEMA rental assistance because they shared housing or because they had not lived in their pre-earthquake residence for thirty continuous days or more;
- (2) funding for projects to provide emergency shelter with equal priority to projects that rehabilitate and/or lease shelter for individuals denied FEMA rental assistance because they had not lived in a unit for thirty continuous days prior to the earthquake;
- (3) renitification to persons denied FEMA assistance who were not explicitly informed of their right to appeals that they may do so within sixty days and publication of written guidelines for appeals procedures;
- (4) extension of the appeal period for the State of California's Individual and Family Grant program from twenty to sixty days and notification to all IFG applicants of this change; and
- (5) revision of FEMA's letter to successful housing applicants so as to more fully inform them of available benefits.

The settlement is recorded in an order signed by the Court. You may wish to consult this order, which is the most complete statement of the settlement, to determine whether you are a class member and if you approve the settlement. A copy is available for examination between 9:00 a.m. and 5:00 p.m., weekdays, at the following locations:

However, you will not be able to bring any further action on the claims included in this settlement. If you believe you are entitled to benefits and wish information concerning the settlement, write or call the class counsel listed above.
2. Come forward as a member of the class and object to the settlement. You may present the objections yourself or through an attorney. All objections must be made in writing and sent by first class mail postmarked not later than March 27, 1990 to:

Thuyền Giảm Tội Ác tại Tenderloin

bài của Joshua Merrow

Năm trước vùng Tenderloin đã nhận thấy sự giảm thiểu của tội ác bạo lực tại đây. Những bà con trong vùng chưa hài lòng với sự bất quân bình về mức độ cao của bạo lực. Từ 1 tháng Giêng đến 31 tháng 12, 1989 vi phạm các trọng tội tại Tenderloin đã giảm 9 phần trăm. Một số vi phạm trong tội đã giảm một cách đáng kể: hiếp dâm giảm 21 phần trăm, hành hung cướp giật giảm 14 phần trăm và hành hung gây thương tích giảm 26 phần trăm trong năm 1989 so với 1988.

Cộng đồng viên Leroy Looper, điều khiển the Tenderloin Crime Abatement Committee (Ủy Ban Bài Trừ Tội Phạm) cho rằng việc thuyền giảm tội phạm tại đây là kết quả của sự cố gắng hỗ trợ giữa dân chúng địa phương và nỗ lực của cảnh sát. Ông nói: "Có các sĩ quan cảnh sát đến họp mặt với chúng tôi để nghe tiếng nói của người dân. Đó là một điểm son. Sự đóng góp của công dân đã làm suy giảm tội ác tại đây."

Toàn thành phố San Francisco nói chung đã ghi nhận sự gia tăng của một số tội ác. Cảnh sát cho biết hiếp dâm gia tăng 16 phần trăm, cướp giật hành hung tăng 2.7 phần trăm và đã tử vong tăng 7.7 phần trăm trong năm 1989. Dù tội ác có thuyền giảm trong vùng, Tenderloin vẫn chưa phải là chỗ lý tưởng. Năm 1989 có 15,630 vụ được ghi nhận. Chia ra có 13 vụ sát nhân, 45 hiếp dâm, 472 trộm cướp hành hung, 692 đã tử vong, 988 đã tử vong nhẹ, 64 vụ giết sắc phụ nữ, 448 vụ trộm tư gia và 468 cấp xe. Điều đó cho Tenderloin một tỷ lệ 13.1 phần trăm tội ác vi phạm trong toàn San Francisco. Một tỷ lệ cao, bất quân bình so với dân số cư ngụ tại đây, vì họ chiếm có 3 phần trăm tổng số dân San Francisco.

Các vụ xảy ra về số lượng có thay đổi, nhưng các nỗi làm sần khâu của tội phạm không thay đổi. Trong suốt ba năm qua, phần nhiều các tội ác tại Tenderloin đều xảy ra gần công viên Boeddeker Park. Bốn vụ sát nhân ở Tenderloin trong năm 1989 (31 phần trăm của tổng số trong vùng) đều xảy ra trong phạm vi sáu khu phố chạy quanh từ đường Turk, Ellis, Leavenworth và Mason. Tại đây, Cảnh sát cho biết số vùng 176 đã xảy ra 8 vụ hiếp dâm (18 phần trăm của tổng số San Francisco) 130 vụ cướp đã tử vong (28 phần trăm), 197 đã tử vong nặng (28 phần trăm) 74 vụ trộm tư gia (17 phần trăm), 8 vụ giết sắc (13 phần trăm) và 53 cấp xe (16 phần trăm). Tính theo số, đối với cảnh sát, bị số plot 176 là vùng xói đậu nóng bỏng nhất của thành phố này.

Khu vực cuối ở đường Jone đã trở nên bất an từ vài năm qua, làm chôn tỵ hợp cho các tay buôn xì ke và dân vô gia cư nghề nghiệp vì một số thương vụ đã đóng cửa tại đây Lower Jones Street has become a trouble spot in the last couple of years.

Theo ông Looper sự kiện mức độ tội ác khá cao quanh vùng công viên Boeddeker Park là một thử thách lớn cho cộng đồng. Ông nhấn mạnh nhu cầu phối hợp các hoạt động về chương trình cho các trẻ em và nhiều hoạt động khác tại công viên này để "thụ hút những thành phần mới và những lớp người khác thay vì các tay buôn ma túy, xì ke mà đối với ông họ là những người trách nhiệm về cao độ của tội ác trong vùng này.

Năm 1989 Plot 176 rất nguy hiểm từ 8 đến 10 giờ đêm, thời điểm mà 12 phần trăm tội phạm thực hiện nổi dậy. Và từ 10 giờ đến nửa đêm, 11 phần trăm tội ác xảy ra. Phạm pháp thuyền giảm vào mức độ thấp nhất vào giữa 6 đến 8 giờ sáng, chỉ có 3 phần trăm ghi nhận.

Vùng kế cận với bị số plot 548 cũng không kém nguy hiểm. Chạy theo các con đường Turk, Geary, Larkin và Leavenworth, nổi dậy đã chứng kiến 3 vụ sát nhân, 9 hiếp dâm, 62 cướp hành hung, 86 đã tử vong nặng, 66 trộm tư gia, 4 giết sắc và 54 cấp xe. Vùng này các tay anh chị thường làm ăn mạnh từ 10 giờ đến nửa đêm, ghi nhận 13 phần trăm và an toàn nhất là giữa 4 và 6 giờ sáng, ghi nhận 4 phần trăm tội phạm.

Khu an toàn nhất của vùng Tenderloin với ám số plot 554 bao bọc Tòa Thị Chính (City Hall) và khu hướng Đông gồm Van Ness, Larkin, McAllister và đường Grove. Tại đây chỉ ghi nhận một vụ hiếp dâm, 4 vụ cướp, 6 đã tử vong nặng, 13 đã tử vong nhẹ, một giết sắc và 9 cấp xe. Không có vụ sát nhân nào và cũng không có nha ở nên không có vụ trộm tư gia.

Vùng bị số 554 không có tội phạm xảy ra từ 12 giờ đêm đến 2 giờ sáng trong năm 1989. Nói chung thì 16 phần trăm tội phạm vùng này đều xảy ra giữa 8 đến 10 giờ đêm, 15 phần trăm trong giờ ăn trưa (12 giờ trưa đến 2 giờ chiều) và 14 phần trăm giữa 2 đến 4 giờ chiều. Nhiều người cho rằng năm 1989 đã có suy giảm tội ác trong vùng Tenderloin là một sự rất ngạc nhiên. "Sự suy giảm chắc chắn không đúng với quan niệm quân chúng," Đại Ủy Cảnh Sát Tom Murphy phát biểu. Ông lưu ý rằng một ít tội phạm đã lôi kéo dư luận quân chúng hướng về vùng này gây cho bà con ý niệm về tội ác trong vùng.

Theo Đại Ủy Murphy ông không cho rằng có sự liên hệ giữa hoạt động của cảnh sát và sự suy giảm tội phạm trong vùng. Mặt khác ông cho rằng sự phát triển thêm về dịch vụ thương mại tại đây đã giúp giảm thiểu tội ác. Ông nói: "Trong vùng (Tenderloin) này chúng tôi làm việc đến điên điếu. Nhưng chúng tôi đã từng làm việc như thế lâu năm rồi. Hy vọng chúng tôi có thể đạt thành quả."

Trở Ngại Chính Của Tù Cải Tạo

bài của Joe Trần

Những kẻ trông inh ỏi của năm ngoái đánh dấu cam kết Mỹ-Việt ứng thuận phóng thích và cho 100,000 tù cải tạo định cư tại Mỹ cho tới ngày hôm nay còn số tù cải tạo thực sự đặt chân đến xứ cờ hoa này cùng với thân nhân gia đình quả là chưa thấm thía với những con số không lồ ước tính gia đình đến Mỹ. Dự tính có chừng 7,000 người nữa sẽ đến từ nay đến cuối tháng 9 này.

Con số nói trên không đáp ứng với dự tính của Bộ Ngoại giao Mỹ dựa theo thỏa hiệp Mỹ-Việt ký tháng 7, 1989. Theo đó thì mỗi tháng có 1,000 tù cải tạo được sang Mỹ bắt đầu tháng 10 năm ngoái. Hai bên ký kết cho đi và nhận 100,000 tù cải tạo lập nghiệp ở xứ cờ hoa HOAHẬU ÁODÀI 1990, Hoàng Ánh Tuyết lạng ky niệm cho Phụ Tá Thứ Trưởng Ngoại Giao Robert Funseth tại buổi Hội Thảo Về Tù Cải Tạo ở San Jose tháng 3 vừa qua.

sẽ đi, sẽ đến Hoa kỳ này. Tuy nhiên trong buổi hội thảo mới đây tại San Jose giữa Phụ Tá Thứ Trưởng Ngoại Giao Robert Funseth và các đại diện chánh quyền tiểu bang, địa phương và các đoàn thể cộng đồng Việt thì ông Funseth đã nhấn nhủ tất cả bà con thân nhân Việt kiều trong vùng vịnh San Francisco và nhấn họ liên lạc với thân nhân còn kẹt bên nhà xin mọi người "đứng ngả lưng, đứng liều mạng, hay kiên nhẫn đợi chờ."

Ông nói: "Chúng tôi (Mỹ) không muốn bà con vượt biển bằng ghe tàu. Nó rất nguy hiểm. Họ bị cướp, tấn công, hãm hiếp, giết chóc, quý vị đều biết. Xin hãy kêu gọi bà con thân nhân còn bên nhà đứng nán lòng". Ý ông muốn nói tất cả người Việt bên nhà nên đi qua các chương trình ODP và di dân vì là đường lối an toàn hơn, tuy phải chờ đợi lâu.

Ông Phụ Tá Thứ Trưởng Funseth là diễn viên chính trong buổi hội thảo về các tù cải tạo ngày 17 tháng 3 vừa rồi ở San Jose. Hơn 300 giới chức Liên Bang, Tiểu bang, địa phương và lãnh tụ các đoàn thể khắp vùng Bay Area hiện diện.

Ông Funseth cho biết từ đầu năm đến bây giờ đã có hơn 1,000 tù cải tạo và trong những năm gần đây.

Ông Funseth cho sự chậm trễ thực thi sự cam kết là do quá nhiều hồ sơ ở Việt Nam. Ngoài số tù cải tạo còn có cả 500,000 đồng bào khác nằm trong danh sách di dân sang Mỹ qua chương trình ODP. Nhiều người đã được phải đoàn Mỹ thăm vấn và chấp nhận nhưng gặp nhiều trở ngại trong vấn đề khám sức khỏe và xếp hạng để rời Việt Nam. Cả hai điểm đó đều ngoài tầm tay của Mỹ vì thuộc thẩm quyền Vietnam trong lãnh vực sức khỏe và cơ quan International Organization for Migration trong trách nhiệm chuyên vận hàng không. Ông nêu một ví dụ: "Chúng tôi đã thăm vấn 26,439 người, trong đó 10,117 người được ghi trong danh sách đi máy bay, và thực sự có 3,194 được báo có chuyến bay, nhưng hơn 3,194 đó vẫn chưa rời Việt Nam".

Ông Funseth rất lạc quan cho rằng vào cuối tháng 9 năm nay sẽ có 51,000 người Việt thuộc mọi thành phần con lai, đoàn tụ gia đình, nhân đạo và di dân cũng như tù cải tạo sẽ đến định cư tại Mỹ. Cũng theo ông, trong vòng 5 năm tới sẽ có tổng số 250,000 bà con Việt đến Mỹ lập nghiệp từ nay đến 1994. Được

Công Nhân Khách Sạn Đeo Mặt Nạ Biểu Tình

bài của Lisa Mountz

Một cuộc phản đối tượng trưng, ngày 19 tháng 3 vừa qua nhân công và thành viên của Nghiệp Đoàn Khách Sạn đã đeo mặt nạ giấy biểu tình phản đối Khách Sạn Parc 55 trước số 55 Cyril Magnin St. Gần 200 người biểu tình đánh dấu ngày đầu Ủy Ban Quốc Gia Liên Lạc Lao Động (the National Labor Relations Board) phân xử chủ nhân Lawrence Chan của khách sạn Parc 55 và nhóm quản lý về hơn 70 vi phạm luật lao động liên bang.

Chủ Tịch Nghiệp Đoàn 2 Công Nhân Khách Sạn Sherri Chiesa phát biểu: "Khách sạn Parc 55 đã thực hiện một chiến dịch chống nghiệp đoàn rất tinh vi và bản thủ chứa tưng cò." Các đoàn viên tố cáo ban quản lý của Parc 55 đã trả thù các nhân công muốn nhập Nghiệp Đoàn và dọa sa thải họ nếu ủng hộ chủ trưởng nghiệp đoàn hóa nhân công của Parc 55. Mới đây, theo phát ngôn viên của nghiệp đoàn, Parc 55 đã chụp hình đoàn người biểu tình và sa thải một số người có mặt trong các hình ảnh đó. Cũng theo nguồn tin của nghiệp đoàn, ban quản lý của Parc 55 cũng đã thăm vấn nhân viên về hoạt động nghiệp đoàn của họ, xen lẫn vào việc phân phát tài liệu nghiệp đoàn, hối lộ và dò xét canh chừng các nhân viên.

Những người biểu tình đeo mặt nạ để quản lý khỏi nhận diện được họ, tranh khỏi bị khủng bố hay trả thù cho những nhân viên Parc 55. Các đoàn viên tố cáo Parc 55 đã đuổi một người dọn phòng sau khi cho đường sự xem tấm hình của y và các con có mặt trong đoàn biểu tình. Tổng quản lý của Parc 55, ông Dan King cho các điều vụ cáo trên là ấu trĩ và vô nghĩa. Ông nói: "Lý do chúng tôi chụp hình vì những người biểu tình phạm luật. Chúng tôi có phép cầm những người biểu tình không được xâm nhập vào hành lang, bên xe và phòng đợi. Những người biểu tình ngăn cửa, cản trở sự ra vào của khách hàng. Mọi tuân họ đều vi phạm luật lệ như thế. Họ đã bị bắt nhiều lần."

Nhân công tranh đấu cho quyền lợi phụ cấp y tế và tăng lương đều đặn, nhưng theo họ, mục đích chính là đòi hỏi quản lý nể nang nhân viên và cho họ có tiếng nói trên công việc. Ông Kevin O'Connor, Giám đốc nhân viên của Nghiệp Đoàn 2 nói: "Chúng tôi có đa số nhân viên của Parc 55 ký thác muốn nhập nghiệp đoàn. Nhưng nhiều người trong đó sợ không dám xúc tiến vì quản lý Parc 55 chống đối nghiệp đoàn rất mãnh liệt."

Trong lúc đoàn người biểu tình tuần hành dọc theo đường Cyril Magnin trước mặt khách sạn Parc 55 các xe qua lại bóp còi inh ỏi ủng hộ người biểu tình. Trong đám biểu tình có đồng nhân viên thuộc nhiều khách sạn lân cận tham gia với nhân công Parc 55 tỏ tình liên đới đoàn kết của nghiệp đoàn. Edna Barnes, một thành viên của nghiệp đoàn khách sạn khác phát biểu: "Sự liên đới đoàn kết của chúng tôi là phương thế duy nhất để thắng. Nếu được phụng dưỡng mã thì chúng tôi chẳng đi đến đâu."

hỏi về thời gian thủ tục ông Funseth cho biết vấn đề lâu dài hay mau chóng cho việc xúc tiến hồ sơ thay đổi rất nhiều tùy theo mỗi trường hợp khác nhau. Không có con số nhất định là bao lâu. Ông nói: "Không có một thời gian nhất định nào. Những xin quý vị nhẫn nại với bà con bên nhà đứng nán lòng, xin cố chờ đợi."

Hỏi về quy chế và tiêu chuẩn để được đi Mỹ ông Funseth xác định rằng theo thỏa hiệp Mỹ-Việt tất cả mọi tù cải tạo đều được thu nhận và được phép rời Việt Nam để định cư tại Hoa kỳ, kể cả những người không có thân nhân bên

này. Ông lưu ý: "Nếu quý vị biết có ai, có trường hợp nào bị bác đơn mà nhận thấy họ có đủ điều kiện thì xin đừng ngần ngại liên lạc với Bộ Ngoại Giao hay viết cho chương trình ODP ở Vọng Các."

Buổi Hội thảo được tổ chức về Cựu Tù Cải Tạo dưới sự phối hợp của Văn Phòng Thượng Nghị Sĩ Tiểu Bang Art Torres, Liên Hội Người Việt Bắc Cali, Trung Tâm Văn Hóa Đông Dương và sự ủng hộ của rất nhiều đoàn thể cộng đồng, các chương trình ty, nạn địa phương tại San Jose và vùng Bay Area.

Tân Thư Viện Sẽ Hoàn Tất Vào 1995

bài của Jennifer Wright

Các Ủy Viên Thư Viện tháng trước mới mở một trang sử mới cho Thư Viện Chánh của San Francisco khi tiết lộ kế hoạch xây cất một thư viện mới với kinh phí 105 triệu Mỹ kim tại Marschall Square, ngang đường Fulton. Theo ước tính hiện nay, thư viện mới sẽ cao bảy tầng, trong đó có 2 tầng ngầm dưới đất, bà Kathy Page, phụ trách về phát triển cơ sở thư viện cho biết như thế. Thư viện mới sẽ rộng gấp đôi thư viện hiện hữu và sẽ chiếm cứ khu đất chạy từ đường Hy de Grove, Larkin và Fulton, ngoại trừ một góc dành cho đài kỷ niệm tượng Pioneer Monument.

Công cuộc xây cất dự trù hoàn thành vào năm 1995 và khi đó sách vở cùng các tài liệu khác được đưa về đó. Bảo Tàng Viện Nghệ Thuật Á Châu (The Asian Art Museum) sẽ được rời về cơ sở của thư viện hiện tại.

Tại buổi họp của Ủy ban thư viện ngày 13 tháng 3, nhiều người trong số 40 thành viên có mặt đã tỏ ra băn khoăn về đề nghị vứt bỏ sách để có chỗ thay cho máy điện toán, một ý nghĩ mà Ken Dowlin, Quản thủ Thư Viện, đã đề cập trong cuốn sách ông xuất bản năm 1984 với nhan đề "The Library of the Future."

Những bà Page xác định với hội trưởng không có chuyện vứt bỏ sách. Bà nói: "Chúng ta sẽ không dùng máy điện toán để thay cho sách. Các máy điện toán của thư viện chỉ dùng để xếp loại, kiểm soát sách cho mượn và các vấn đề hành chánh khác." Thư viện mới sẽ gồm: một khu bán tặng phẩm, bán sách, một khu rộng rãi hơn cho trẻ em, trong đó có cả một "trung tâm khám phá điện tử," một "Browsing Collection" lưu những sách hiếm, chỗ dành riêng phục vụ những người câm điếc, một khu dành cho Newcomers' Help Center (Giúp Người Mới Đến) có những sách ngoại Anh văn và tài liệu học ESL, và một San Francisco History Room (Phòng Lịch Sử của San Francisco).

Các trẻ em trong vùng cơ thể, vui vẻ coi xiếc và múa hát cùng với các diễn viên khi gánh xiếc Make-a-Circus đến trình diễn tại Tenderloin mùa hè này. Neighborhood kids can join the circus and become a clown with Make-a-Circus.
